We started from Roseau at five in the morning, each on one of the ramshackle island ponies, which look as if they had not half a foreleg amongst them, and which will carry you uphill and down dale all day and never make a mistake. Our route lay up the Roseau Valley, due east along a steep winding track through luxuriant tropical scenery which I will not be so foolish as to describe. We rode for two hours, and finally arrived at a tiny negro settlement called Laudat,* which hangs, like a gull's nest on a cliff, above the magnificent waterfall which is some day to supply the power for lighting Roseau.

Here we found a superior black man who was to be our guide, and who at once took charge of the ponies and placed them in a stable for the day. We on our part proceeded to discuss a light breakfast of hard-boiled eggs and coffee, and at eight o'clock followed our guide across half a mile of steep open country until we came to the forest. A path through the forest had no doubt once been cut by some one, but the bush grows quickly, and but for our guide we should have soon lost it. Here and there biggish trees had fallen across the line of march, which had to be scrambled over, and it was nine o'clock before we saw a break in the woods and struck a mountain stream, which runs down the slope to the waterfall below us.

All this time we had been taking a south-easterly course and had reached a spot somewhat to the south of the line of the Roseau Valley. To the north of us lay three-quarters of the island with a huge backbone of mountain, rising hill above hill, and Marne Diablotin, the highest of all, in the middle of them. In front of us to the south was a range of hills, lower than those to the north, forming spurs to an irregular cone within which lay the object of our expedition. Crossing the stream at its shallowest part, we found the mountain side rising abruptly in front of us. It was densely covered with bush and trees, and so steep that we could only make our way up by hauling ourselves from tree to tree, and it took another hour before we reached the top. On surmounting the last obstacles we found ourselves on the rim of a huge crater. The side to the south of us had been broken away, and the effect was that of an amphitheatre, on the further side of which you could see the southern portion of the island, the ocean beyond, and Martinique in the distance. The Boiling Lake, which was hidden from our view, lay at the lower extremity, with an outfall, when it overflowed, on the broken side of the crater, on to the shoulders of the mountain itself.

The side of the crater was almost precipitous beneath us for a depth of some 50ft., and it then sloped down with a steep gradient towards the broken side. Before and behind us the contrast was great; we were leaving the luxuriant vegetation of the tropical hillside to plunge into an arid rocky basin without a sign of life in it. Further down the slope small streams trickled highly charged with sulphur and warm to the touch; while further still huge jets of steam and boiling water burst from crevices in the ground, like the stream of a mighty fire-engine and with the hissing roar of ten thousand locomotives. The ground itself, as you trod upon it, gave the impression of being a mere crust, and you half felt that, had you an alpenstock in your hand, you could drive it through into the subterranean cauldron.

After a scramble of about three-quarters of an hour we worked our way down the side of the crater till we reached a low ledge of rock. A gust of wind caught what had seemed to be a bank of cloud in front of us, but was in fact a huge volume of steam, and, sweeping it away, disclosed, about 20ft. below us, a small piece of water some 200 to 300 yards long. Instantly the cloud of steam shut out the view again, and then rolled away in wreaths.

For upwards of an hour we sat there watching the changing scene, catching glimpses from time to time of the troubled water beneath us. In places the lake appeared to boil and seethe and to rise and fall, to become smooth and to boil again. Towards the centre was evidently the region of its chief disturbance. One of our planter-friends told us that he had been there on a previous occasion and found the lake dry and the floor exposed, and that as he sat and watched it the water rushed up through vent-holes in the floor and flooded part of it and then ran back again. The temperature must have been fearfully high, for a few weeks before we were there two white men and a black guide had foolishly tried to get across at the foot of the lake, and the guide had slipped and fallen into the water, and before the others could get him out the flesh was half-boiled off his bones.

We had some sandwiches with us, which we ate, and our guide fetched us some water, which he declared came from a sweet spring—the only one there. We drank a little, and it tasted fairly clean; but I regretted having done so, for the inside of my mouth and throat was sore for days after. There is sulphur everywhere. Everything is impregnated with sulphur. A pair of silver links I was wearing and some silver in my pocket were black as ink before I reached home.

It was noon when we started on our return journey, and it took us over an hour to get back to the rim of the crater; we had a rest and smoked a pipe when we got there, feeling that we had broken the neck of our journey. A couple more hours brought us again to Laudat, where our thoughtful and hospitable planter friends had provided a good square meal. The ponies took us briskly homewards, and we reached Roseau about six o'clock.

I think it should be mentioned that dangerous exhalations are sometimes found in the neighbourhood of this lake—probably carbonic acid gas is generated and expelled in large volumes. It is only a short time ago that a young Englishman visited the lake with a black guide. The guide was seen to fall, and was evidently in great distress. The young fellow went to his assistance, but could not carry him out of danger, and, refusing to leave his side, himself fell a victim to the asphyxiating fumes.

* Pronounced Lodār.

THE FOREIGN POLICY AND HIGHER DEFENCE OF THE EMPIRE

By Lancelot Lawton

The forthcoming Imperial Conference is destined to stand out in the history of the British Empire as an event of crucial importance. In all quarters of the world, wherever British dominion holds sway, high expectations are entertained that its deliberations will decide the permanent basis of the structure of an Imperial foreign policy and a permanent plan for the development of Imperial strategy in its relation to Imperial defence. These broad and supreme issues, involving as they do at one and the same time the safety and the unity of the Empire, overshadow every other topic set upon the agenda for discussion. The Government has given an explicit promise that no useful information shall be kept back. If they remain true to their word, then

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

the Colonial Premiers will be admitted to the inner confidences of Downing Street and will be summoned to the meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Naturally, proceedings of this kind, fraught as they will be with vital significance in the scheme of Empire, must be conducted amid circumstances of closely-guarded secrecy. Yet the character of the issues to be raised are known beforehand with tolerable certainty. It is our foreign policy that dictates our Imperial strategy. And if we examine frankly and critically our foreign policy, as it is at present, and venture reasoned speculation as to how it is likely to work out in the future, we shall gain a very fair idea of the magnitude and importance of the task that lays before the Conference. We cannot deny the fact that on the surface our foreign policy appears to be in direct conflict with the aims and purposes of the Colonies. It would be idle to blind ourselves to the unpopularity of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. This alliance has been regarded by our kinsmen as an admission, undesirable in every way, of the yellow races to fraternity and full equality with the white races. Such a view is alone sufficient in their minds to carry with it a condemnation of British statesmanship. For Canada, Australia, and New Zealand are united in their determination to preserve their territories exclusively for the white man. It is not the writer's intention to attempt at the present juncture a justification or otherwise of their policy. But in approaching the subject in a general way let us not forget that it is a policy deep-rooted in passionate sentiment, and that should we seek by any persuasion of our own to turn our Colonies from it, we shall fail not only in our immediate purpose, but shall strike hard at the very foundations of Empire.

Our Colonies have seen that Japan, by the aid of British political support and by the aid of British capital (too often denied themselves), has risen to a position of dominating superiority in the Pacific, and, rightly or wrongly, they regard her as a potential menace to their peace, if not to their existence. They have seen, too, that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance has been followed by the withdrawal of all the British battleships, six in number, from the Pacific, and that our prestige has suffered because of the fantastic notion abroad in China that British interests in this region have been handed to the Japanese for safe keeping.

And finally, the Colonies do not ignore the many evidences of transition in China—transition which threatens vast and far-reaching consequences to themselves. It so happens that while their policy is somewhat in conflict with the spirit of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, it is in perfect harmony with the attitude of the United States towards Oriental problems. When in 1908 tension ran high between Japan and America a powerful fleet of sixteen battleships which President Roosevelt sent to the Pacific received a welcome from New Zealand and Australia that was remarkable for its warmth. In a speech reported by Reuter Sir Joseph Ward declared that the American fleet was coming to Australia not as that of a foreign country, but as that of a nation which was kith and kin of the Anglo-Saxon race. There would some day, he added, be a fight to decide whether white men or Orientals were to govern Australasia and the Pacific Islands, and the American fleet would then fight shoulder to shoulder with the Old World. The New Zealand Press frankly expressed the view that in the future Great Britain and America would be called upon to compete with Japan for the command of the Pacific, and urged with complete unanimity that the two great Anglo-Saxon countries should shape their politics in unison. At Sydney over half a million people awaited the arrival of the American fleet, and the Press strenuously advocated that Australia should co-operate with America in protecting their mutual interests, even if by so doing her relations with Japan should be strained.

The Americans, on their side, were not slow to appreciate the significance of the occasion. It is not inopportune, in view of the important discussion that will take place at the forthcoming Conference on Imperial Foreign Policy, to reproduce here the comment of the New York Tribune, one of the most conservative organs of public opinion in the United States:—

> There are, however, two other motives, not unworthy nor unnatural, which we must suppose to be potent in the case. One is suggested by the remembrance that the British Navy has so reduced its strength in the Pacific as no longer to have its old-time predominance there. It would scarcely be unfair to say that it has voluntarily abdicated its supremacy in the Pacific in favour of its Japanese ally. Nor can there be offence in recalling that the Japanese alliance is not regarded with enthusiastic favour in Australia, or in suspecting that the statesmen and people of the Commonwealth, who are so earnestly intent upon making and keeping it, in their own familiar phrase, a "white Australia," are especially gratified at the advent in Pacific waters of an American fleet somewhat more powerful than any under the flag of the Rising Sun. That is to be said without the least thought of anything like the probability of a clash between the two chief Pacific Powers. It is simply a recognition of the undisguisable fact that racial feelings are uncommonly strong in Australia, and that the Australians would rather have an Anglo-Saxon fleet, American if not British, dominant in Pacific waters than any other.

Several American journals even went the length of discussing seriously the possibility of an Anglo-American Alliance brought about through the influence of Australia. Admiral Sperry, who was in command of the fleet, referred to the inner significance of the welcome, and added that "it indicated real and heartfelt sympathy between the two English-speaking nations, which are united not only by the ties of blood but also by great commercial interests in the Pacific and elsewhere."

A year earlier, when anti-Japanese riots occurred in British Columbia, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was the subject of considerable criticism of an unfavourable kind throughout Canada. A crisis was only averted by the action of Japan in wisely deciding of her own accord to restrict emigration from her shores. But it is realised both in Japan and in the Colonies that this measure can only be a temporary expedient. A large and influential section of political thought in Japan regard the attitude of America and our Colonies on this question as altogether incompatible with the place which their country has won for itself in the comity of nations. Doubtless the Government hold similar views, but for obvious reasons they are compelled to pursue a policy of extreme caution until such time as Japan shall be strong enough in a military sense to demand equality of treatment. It is against this time that our Colonies are now preparing. Australia and Canada are building up their own Navies, and it is plainly hinted, if not expressed in so many words, that these Navies will only be employed in wars of which the Colonial Governments approve. It is a disquieting situation thus disclosed, one that can only be dealt with by statesmen of Imperial minds.

Since the last Conference much has happened. It is now beyond all reasonable doubt that a comprehensive Treaty of Arbitration will be concluded between Great Britain and America. Such an instrument will be cordially welcomed by our Colonies. But the question may well be asked: Will the friends and enemies of Great Britain be also the friends and enemies of America? Already the question has been raised: Are the friends of Great Britain the friends of Great Britain's Colonies? And here we are brought abruptly back to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance and to the urgent need for harmony in the working out of an Imperial foreign policy.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

It may be that our Colonies do not sufficiently realise that we were faced with no other alternative than to make an alliance with the Japanese; that, in other words, if we had not entered into an arrangement with them they would certainly have sought and found the friendship of another Power, a Power doubtless hostile to this country, in which event we should have been elbowed completely out of the Far East. Moreover, the German menace in Europe required that we should concentrate our naval strength in home waters. The treaty with Japan, as I have already explained, enabled us to withdraw six battleships from the Pacific. Yet it is clear from the trend of their naval policy that Australia and Canada are determined that they shall be able to defend their own shores with their own forces, independent of assistance from the Mother Country.

It will be the end of the Empire if this idea of separate interests is allowed to prevail. The interests of each and every unit must be broadened so as to embrace those of the Empire as a whole.

In 1915 the Anglo-Japanese Alliance expires; that is to say, that by the time the Imperial Conference assembles again the question as to whether or not the treaty will be renewed must have been decided. It is not inconceivable that the Government have already in mind a definite course of action in preparation for the year 1915. If so, it is to be hoped that they will take the Colonial Premiers fully into their confidence. The importance of this aspect of our foreign relations from the point of view of Imperial Unity cannot be overestimated. We must understand that if we are to continue to rely upon Japan for relief from the necessity of maintaining a large fleet in the Pacific then our Colonies will shape their naval policies on more or less independent lines. Rightly they will claim that they have their own interests to safeguard and that as these are of necessity opposed to the aims of Japan, they cannot and will not blindly subscribe to the spirit of the Alliance.

To urge upon them that the European situation demands great sacrifices will prove of no avail. They will then retort that if the British Navy protects the Mother Country they on their part will be well able to look after themselves.

Our Colonies have not been slow to realise that the year 1915 is one fraught with grave international significance. Not only is it the year when the Alliance expires, but it is the year when Japan will have completed her programme of armaments, when the Chinese will be in the enjoyment of Constitutional Government, when the Panama Canal will be opened, and when Russia will have doubled the Siberian railway and built a new line through her own territories to the Far East; and each and every one of these developments concern directly the future of the Colonies.

If Great Britain does not take the initiative in forming a strong Imperial fleet for the Pacific, Australia and Canada will ultimately supply the deficiency, and the cause of the Imperial Unity will then be dealt a death-blow.

The Colonies are willing to take up their share of the burden. To their squadrons, therefore, we must add not one but at least six battleships. Then, and then only, shall we have a truly Imperial Navy. No expenditure in such a cause can be too enormous when viewed in its proper light—the inevitable price of this great Empire of which we boast so much, and for which, comparatively speaking, we sacrifice so little.

BRITANNIA

My trident rules
  O'er all the seven seas,
Ten thousand islands
  List to my decrees,
Continents five
  Share my Imperial realm,
Steersman, I watch,
  One hand upon the helm.

See closely linked
  In one my kingdoms three,
See hand in hand
  My lands beyond the sea.
Choïred in attune
  With one harmonious note
In Pan-Britannic
  Witen-a-gemote.

ENGLAND

We of the Anglo-Saxon line,
Whose watchword ever was "Combine,"
  "Shoulder to shoulder all,"
In love fraternal still abide,
Immovable—the world astride,
  Till the last trump shall call.

Stolid but shrewd, we guard the crown
Our ancestors have handed down
  From traitorous word and pen.
As Englishmen we spring to grip
The good right hand of fellowship
  Held forth by loyal men.

SCOTLAND

Dy'e ken bonny Scotland
  The best of a' lan's,
Wi' leal Hieland Chieftains
  And leal Hieland clans,
D'ye ken the stark lads
  From the brae and the glen,
And a' the braw lairds
  The South Kintra within?
There be stags in the forest,
  And tods in their haunt,
There be fush in the river,
  And moorcock ayont.
So here's to the lan'
  That we a' love the best,
That has sent forth her sons
  To the East and the West.

IRELAND

Here's to the isle of conspicuous piety,
Here's to the land where we all love sobriety,
Here's to the people whose swate contrariety
Makes them most welcome, where'er they may be.

Ready to fiddle and ready to fight,
Ready to foot it by day or by night,
Friend of a friend in a place that is tight—
And such was owld Ireland, and ever will be.

Cheery at weddings and cheery at wakes
Laughing aloud at each other's mistakes
Freed by St. Patrick from toads and from snakes Away from the Skelligs to Island Magee.

Printed and Published for the Proprietors by Odhams Ltd., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY

AND

LITERATURE

No. 2038 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MAY 27, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ECONOMICAL

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Sheffield Simplex

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD,

Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest References. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE. POULTRY,
LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

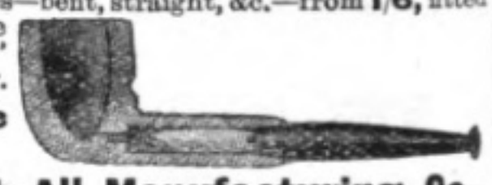
The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.



THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL. — An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions. — For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

Catalogue No. 378.

JUNE SUPPLEMENT TO GLAISHER'S CATALOGUE

Of Popular and Attractive Books
at Cheap Remainder Prices.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON,
(and at 14, George Street, Croydon).
The books are on view at both addresses.

As you write use the best Ink. The best is AZURYTE. Order it at your Stationer's.

F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific MSS. carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science). Translations from French and German.

GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Book-finder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOK-SHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. neatly and quickly typed. 8d. per 1,000 words. Actors' Parts and Songs at moderate charges.—Box 209, "Academy," 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

EDWARD WHISTLER,
11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

GEORGE ODELL,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

OPHTHALMIC AND MATHEMATICAL OPTICIAN
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.
BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

THE ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	639
The Poets	640
The Caudine Forks	640
Sense or Sensation	640
The Temple Flower-Show	642
Reviews :—
Poetry and Verse—III.	643
High and Low Life in India	644
The Spanish "Dreyfus Case"	645
Nature's Blithe Spirits	646
The Decline of Home Rule	646
County Memorials	647
Wagner in Shirt-sleeves	648
Shorter Reviews	648
Fiction	650
Foreign Reviews	651
A Note on Asceticism	653
Twenty Favourite Books	653
State Insurance	655
Mob Law	656
The Ascetic Entrapped	657
Music	658
The Sweet o' the Year	659
The Coronation Exhibition	660
The Theatre	661
Dutch Pictures at the French Gallery	664
Foreign Affairs	665
In the Temple of Mammon	666
Correspondence	667
Books Received	667

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Academy is published by Messrs. Odhams, Limited, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have great admiration for our neighbours across the Channel, not because but in spite of the audacity of many of their innovations. The latest of the series, which has of course received the tribute of Mr. Cecil Chapman, is the appointment of women as Justices of the Peace to act in Children's Courts. Could perverse ingenuity further go? As a rule children are brought into court because they are out of parental control, or, at all events, are imperfectly amenable to it. Parental control, in the classes referred to, is generally the control of the mother. What earthly use would it be to bring children before a bench of matrons who would have next to no power of punishing them, when they have already flouted the authority of the one matron who can punish them? Whatever use the Children's Courts have arises from the fact that the culprits are impressed by perhaps four or five grave and reverend seigneurs eyeing them as reprovingly as possible through their spectacles. The children naturally suppose that these gentlemen are armed with powers the most severe, and when they are let off with a reprimand, their sleep is troubled for long with nightmares of all the pains and penalties which they have so narrowly escaped. If for a Bench of men, women are substituted, the children who are brought up because they are out of hand at home would, we think, view the excursion as a holiday, and, in a childish way, laugh consumedly over it.

Among the many things for which this remarkably busy year will be notable, enterprise in the theatrical world will take a foremost place. The Little Theatre and the Kingsway Theatre are distinguishing themselves by presenting plays which, for the most part, are of exceptional value and interest. Ibsen's finest dramas are having one of their most successful revivals in the hands of thoroughly capable actors and actresses—and to present Ibsen, it must be remembered, the literary sense is necessary in plentiful measure. Presently we shall have the ever-welcome visitors from the Abbey Theatre of Dublin; meanwhile the enterprise of Sir Herbert Tree enables us to appreciate the tremendous possibilities latent in the Shakespearean pages. To this honourable list must be shortly added the season of French plays which is to open at the Boudoir Theatre, Pembroke Gardens, on June 8th, under the direction of Mr. Vaughan Grey. Twelve performances, extending over two weeks, will be given, and many noted French artists will appear—M. Felix Galipaux, Mlle. Jacqueline Chevalier, Mlle. Lilian Greuze are three names which may be mentioned, and among those who have consented to visit the Boudoir Theatre later on are M. Mounet Sully and Mme. Jeanne Granier. Although admission to these plays will be by subscription only, there is no doubt of their success. Londoners are especially fortunate this year in many ways, and not least in being at the hub of affairs theatrical.

The lamentable tragedy of last Sunday in France, when M. Berteaux, the War Minister, was killed by a falling aeroplane, and M. Monis, the Premier, was severely injured, called forth the sincerest sympathy with those concerned from many diverse quarters. It appears to have been one of those accidents for which no one can be justly blamed; the pilot, in a difficulty and flying low, had to do the best he could, and those who came in his path suffered by chance. No censure apparently can be attached to the promoters of the race from Paris to Madrid, although incidentally it seems to us that while long flights may be desirable and necessary in order to show the possibilities of the new mode of locomotion, actual racing, at the present stage of development, can do little good. The contest of two or three Atlantic liners with urgent mails on board is a different matter; speed for its own sake is hardly a thing to be cultivated at the risk of life. The fatal mishap at Issy is drawing attention to the urgent necessity for a better control of those who merely look on when aeroplanes are being manœuvred—a control which shall protect them and leave the airmen free from anxiety. The nearer the ground the aeroplane is the less choice its pilot has in landing—a fact which does not seem to be realised by the eager spectators, whose admiration overpowers their circumspection.

According to information from St. Petersburg, the widow of Count Tolstoi has recently arrived in that city in order to arrange various testamentary matters, especially those concerning the fate of Yōsnaja Poljana. The Countess is absolutely opposed to selling the estate to any one else than the State. The Tolstoi family are very indignant that the Count's grave is continually being visited not only by his followers and admirers, but by other persons, who arrange picnics there and take away the flowers. Owing to the confiscation by the Crown of the three volumes of Tolstoi's works which the Countess recently published, she has incurred a loss of £1,000. This is not the Countess's only trouble, for she is shortly expected to have a lawsuit with her daughter, the Countess Alexandria, who claims some of the Tolstoi MSS. now in the Countess's possession.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE POETS

'Tis we that gather fuel
  To keep the heart from cold.
The earth is cold and cruel,
  But in its caverns old
We dig for Joy the jewel,
  We test for Truth the gold.

Seeds of a single flower
  Are Beauty, Truth, and Love.
The bloom endures an hour,
  But, scattered from above,
The seedlings gather power
And flood the hills with flower,
  And drown in green the grove.

'Tis we that gather fuel
  That keepeth Love from cold.
The world is cold and cruel,
  But on the churchyard mould
  The daffodils unfold.

M. D. A.

THE CAUDINE FORKS

The circumstances under which the Roman Armies under the Consuls Veturius and Postumius passed under the yoke in the second Samnite War have been variously related by historians. Livy, beset by his characteristic anxiety to prove that Romans were incapable of losing battles, insisted that the capitulation and humiliation occurred without any previous battle having been fought at Caudium, and as a result of the realisation by the Consuls that—enveloped as their army was by the enemy in defiles and mountain passes—escape was not to be hoped for. The Consuls, without striking a blow, preferred the dictates of prudence—as they deemed it—to those of valour, and surrendered at discretion. The heart of the Samnite commander was softened by this suppliant attitude, and he did not put the subservient host to the sword, neither did he send them to slavery.

Livy's extraordinary endeavour to minister to the amour propre of the proud Roman is energetically disputed by other historians, who insist that it was only after a series of defeats that the Roman Army, despairing of retrieving their position, accepted the humiliation of passing between the spears. It is needless to picture the painful scene, bnt morals can be drawn from the incident.

The Roman people repudiated the terms of the capitulation, sacrificed the hostages, and sent the Consuls, with whom responsibility rested, in fetters to Pontius the Samnite. Not until after twenty years had passed by, did Rome retrieve her position.

In national affairs it is easy to see how disastrous a single episode out of harmony with the préstige of generations may prove to be, and how difficult and laborious is the task of retracing false steps. The incident to which we have referred holds another lesson. It is this; in the last resort the people will refuse to ratify actions which compromise the safety and the welfare of the State, preferring to support endless war rather than abdicate pre-eminence and discard the methods by which it has been achieved.

All imperial races have much the same characteristics, and although they may—for a time—appear to be indifferent or inert, when they are strung into action, they exact the uttermost retribution from those who have failed them in crisis.

Although we do not travel the whole journey with Mr. Belloc and Mr. Cecil Chesterton, we think that the events of the past few weeks have served to bring into prominence very clearly that control over its own affairs is being surely and not slowly filched from the people.

We hold that there are certain pillars of national security which are sacrosanct. It may be the duty of a Government to bring into prominence views of betterment or reform; it can, as Lord Rosebery has justly insisted, hardly ever be the duty of an Opposition to adopt such a course. The reason is plain. Constitutions cannot remain in the melting-pot without grave unrest and disturbance of confidence. No Government has any inherent right to lay impious hands on the fabric of State until the people, after prolonged examination and the utmost deliberation, have on their responsibility authorised fundamental change.

A Government, after producing proposals which disturb the foundations of organised society, is bound to take counsel of the people. A Government has the power to fulfil this function by advising a reference to the electorate. An Opposition which introduces revolutionary projects has no such power. Society is kept in flux. It is impossible to teach the new ideas or forecast an opinion whether they are futile or are destined to prevail.

Almost every vice which it is possible to conceive has latterly crept into the machinery of government. A Cabinet, composed of numbers, but in effect the creature of a dominating few, has arrogated to itself a divine heritage of omnipotence and retribution. If the claim of divine right by Kings was hateful, why is a similar claim by Cabinets more tolerable? Kings were no worse offenders in trafficking for support, neither were their Tartarean methods more vindictive or more tortuous. To oppose certain Ministers, to expose their folly and ignorance, is not viewed as a service to the State, but as a crime, the punishment of which the people have in some way vicariously entrusted to persons who have been appointed to offices without their knowledge or sanction.

As we commenced this article with a reference to a Roman disaster, the application of which will not be missed at the present time, we close it with the regret that where we might have expected to listen to the echo of Roman declamatory eloquence we observe submission:—

With 'bated breath and whispering humbleness.

Cecil Cowper.

SENSE OR SENSATION

By E. Ashmead-Bartlett

One of the most disquieting symptoms of public life is the rapidity with which our interests change from day to day. The world is equally fickle towards both individuals and events. To-day one great figure is occupying the stage, to-morrow he is gone and forgotten, and another equally transitory phantom takes his place; to-day all our thoughts are concentrated on one event; to-morrow it has gone, and our interest passes to something else. The Press has brought about an immense and, in many ways, a lamentable change in the continuity of our thoughts, interests, and ideals. We no longer decide anything for ourselves. Hardly a person troubles to frame his own code of ethics, or to form his own views on what is right and essential in our political and civil life, and what is wrong and unessential. We are content to group ourselves, like a flock of sheep seeking shade on a hot summer's day, under two or three political banners. We are content to buy that journal which most nearly represents our views, and accept blindly as the truth everything that is advocated therein, rather than trouble ourselves to analyse each separate issue or problem and from our analysis to form an independent judgment to which our sense of justice and proportion will compel us rigorously to adhere.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

If we leave politics for a moment and deal with those events which come under the heading of news, we are equally shallow and insincere. We are like the spectators at some gladiatorial show, who, satiated with blood, regard almost with indifference the changing fortunes of the combatants in the arena. Every morning millions seize their paper and nervously glance at the principal news page. One day we are driven frantic with excitement over a great fire, and for a short half-hour dilate on its horrors and discuss the neglect of proper preventives; on another an aeroplane disaster commands our passionate interest for a like period; on a third a revolution in some distant land will cause half an hour's genuine anxiety over the future of our own monarchy. But so quickly does our interest evaporate, and such is our desire for something new, that we no longer stop to examine the why and the wherefore of what is taking place around us; we altogether neglect the lessons which may be usefully learnt from these everyday occurrences and applied as palliatives or preventives to similar conditions in the future. Our reasoning faculties are hardly ever brought into play, and only our love of some fresh sensation is catered for. The faculty of excitement has an insatiable maw; it must continually be fed afresh, otherwise it preys upon itself and reduces its victim to a state of continual unrest and nervous irritation. Like a narcotic, it soothes only to cause an ever-increasing desire for renewal as the effects gradually wear off.

During the last ten or fifteen years even the most sober-minded journals have been driven to follow the example of the yellow press and to cater for this love of sensation. There is a story told of the Times a hundred years ago. The editor having received a column containing the first news of the Battle of Waterloo, cut it down by half on the ground that the matter was not of sufficient public importance to justify so much space. But that could hardly happen in these days. Rather would every editor expand two lines into a full column to satisfy the craving of his readers for palatable fare at breakfast. Our sense of proportion seems to have completely gone. We no longer take any sustained interest in those events which are of fundamental importance to the State and to the future prosperity of the citizen. We prefer to devote our whole attention to gorgeous pageants and to the daily movements of innumerable Kings, Queens, Princes, and titled folk who flit across the stage, like the endless film of a cinematograph pleasing the eye for a moment by the gorgeousness of their apparel.

At the present moment it is the Coronation and its attendant festivities which are absorbing our time and attention; everything else seems small and unimportant and must therefore take a back seat for the next two months whilst we rejoice over the commencement of the new reign. We yield to none in our loyalty towards the Throne, and still believe that, in spite of the changes which have come over public opinion of recent years, a monarchy is the most satisfactory form of government for the people of England; yet we believe there is a grave danger in allowing the outward symbols of monarchy to blind us to the true issues on which the future of that monarchy and of the Empire depend. Yet day by day events of world-wide importance are occurring in our midst without those who are to be the gainers or the losers taking a particle of interest in them.

To take a few examples: The Parliament Bill passed its Third Reading almost unnoticed; Lord Lansdowne's scheme for the reform of the House of Lords has degenerated into a debate of purely academic interest to the speakers themselves, and the public will not be bothered to read the speeches or to examine the views of the most eminent men in the land on the future of our Constitution; a year ago we were scared almost into a panic by the decline of our own and the gradual rise of the German Navy, but now the German Emperor has paid us a visit the alluring vista of eternal peace opens before our eyes, and we shall go to sleep in perfect contentment and security until, having exhausted our entire stock of fresh sensations, we are obliged to fall back on some of the old well-worn hardy annuals. The Colonial Premiers have once more arrived in our midst, and the most vital questions affecting for good or for evil our future relations with our Colonies and Dependencies are ripe for discussion. Yet the public takes hardly any interest in these Imperial problems. They give the Colonial Premiers a hearty welcome as distinguished and essential ornaments in a great historic pageant. It is a thousand pities that the Coronation year should have been selected for the consideration of these pressing Imperial problems, when the fierce glare of the Coronation is blinding us to aught else.

It is good for the State that these Coronations do not come more often. The whole continuity of our public life is disturbed. We immediately lose our sense of proportion, and it is hardly a healthy sign when we are content to gaze in wonder and awe at the outward splendour of our Imperial edifice, and at the same time entirely neglect to examine the foundations to see if they are sound and capable of bearing the accumulated glory of centuries of success. St. Paul's Cathedral would long ere this have crumpled to the ground had its care been left to the thousands who daily gaze at it from the street. Cannot a useful lesson be learnt from this?

In Foreign Affairs we notice the same disquieting symptoms. An event of historic interest is taking place that is destined to make a fundamental change in the balance of European power, and which marks the passing of an historic Empire which has endured for thirteen hundred years. But it is hardly noticed in the Press, and if you asked the man in the street what he thought of it he would only greet you with an ignorant smile and continue to gaze at the most newly-erected yellow Coronation pole. Yet six years ago Europe was brought to the verge of war by an action which is now regarded as a fait accompli, and peacefully acquiesced in by all the Powers almost without a dissenting voice being heard. The two examples of South Africa and Morocco show the absolute absurdity of ever going to war over anything in the future, because the prejudices of peoples and the foreign policy of nations change as quickly and frequently as does that of individuals. We fought for three years in South Africa, and to-day our bitterest opponent is Premier of a United South Africa, controlled by a Boer majority. Who will forget the awful wrangle amongst the nations at Algeciras which almost ended in war between France and Germany, but out of which finally emerged that historic Act of Algeciras which it was thought would preserve the independence of Morocco for all time? Yet even as I write these words seven thousand French troops are clamouring at the gates of Fez, and the sacred capital of the Shereefian Empire will shortly echo to the tramp of the armed forces of the infidel for the first time in its chequered history. A huge stretch of the most fertile land in Northern Africa is changing hands without a protest, and eight millions of people are about to lose their independence and be incorporated into the French Empire, yet no one has time even to heave a sigh at the change, and we continue to gaze at the ever-augmenting yellow poles and unsightly stands which mark the route of another pageant, which perhaps is destined to be the apotheosis of our own greatness.

So quickly do events move, so quickly do interests shift from one subject to another, so easily do we become reconciled to changed conditions, so rapidly do we rush into new alliances with those who were formerly our bitterest enemies, that the very insincerity of our feelings and the very shallowness of our national passions are likely to render war impossible in the future. The surest way to preserve the peace of the world would be for the Great Powers to enter into a solemn understanding to preserve the status quo in any quarrel for a period of two years. By the end of that time, in nine cases out of ten, the causes of the quarrel would have disappeared, other issues of greater importance would have arisen, and the litigants would be laughed out of Court by the unanimous voice of both nations. Even if it does not always hold true of individuals, the nations seem to have at length learnt the supreme utility of the Divine injunction, "Let not the sun go down upon thy wrath."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The change is inevitable, but surely there are a few who will shed a tear upon the tomb of the Shereefian Empire. It is all for the best. That is what the majority will say, and the majority is usually right; but the majority is always inartistic, and it is that loss of the artistic which will gather the mourners round the grave of Morocco's independence. The regeneration of the old-world dynasties, which have fallen into decay in the course of ages, is no doubt essential to the progress of civilisation, and for the welfare of mankind at large, but there is something rather sad in contemplating the progress of transformation. If a nation which was once great becomes feeble and lags behind on the road of progress, it does not follow that all in the lives and institutions of the people is necessarily bad or rotten, and requires sweeping away before a new edifice can be built. Much that is excellent survives from former times. There are the local habits, traditions, and practices of religion which have formed the mainspring of the life of the nation in the days of its greatness, and by which the character of its people was formed and the conduct of their life guided. But civilisation is ruthless, and affects not only the material but also the mental and intellectual life of a semi-barbarous people. A virgin land is never the same once the engineer has waged his successful struggle with Nature and the soldier is installed to keep the peace. Surely it is to be regretted that some of the finest of Nature's unclaimed gardens cannot be left in their natural state to delight the traveller and to bring relief to the overtaxed nerves of the dwellers in crowded cities.

And Fez, how will she welcome the Gallic legions? Since Moulai Edress erected her first wall in A.D. 808 no foreign invader has entered the sacred precincts of the city, and now the French are coming, not fighting step by step over the bodies of her defenders, but at the invitation of the successor of nine dynasties of Sultans to protect him against his own subjects. Sic transit gloria mundi.

THE TEMPLE FLOWER-SHOW

THAT the greatest of our annual flower-shows should surpass its predecessors is a matter which we have become accustomed to expect. Each year sees greater perfection of form, colour, and fragrance, and while old favourites remain, new ones are added. The general effect of this year's Show was almost overpowering in its magnificence. The groups of orchids in the large tent were displayed with consummate taste.

Rock-gardening, so far from waning in popularity, is increasing in favour; but when will our nurserymen learn how to make a rock-garden? The enormities which one sees year after year, perpetrated by those who should know better, not merely offend the artistic sense of the beholder, but afford the sole justification for adverse comments. In rock-gardening one is deliberately imitating Nature. If one violates the canons of Nature one's efforts are, without more ado, rendered purposeless. Messrs. Pulhams deserve to be congratulated upon being an exception; their bold stratification of Sussex stone was both correct and effective.

Pace the authorities of last year's exhibition at the White City, we none of us, except Mr. Reginald Farrer, know what a real Japanese garden is. We may therefore praise without fear the one erected by Messrs. Carter and Company, with its miniature lake and bridges, its little summer-house and stone lanterns and evergreens. Those who at present cultivate vegetables, flowers, and fruit—all in the space of a decent-sized billiard-room—may possibly bethink themselves of their folly, and convert their miniature domain into a garden such as this: ever a pleasure, never untidy, offering plenty of scope for constant skill and care.

The lovers of Alpine gems found much to interest them in the Craven Nursery's small but choice display. Mr. Correvan had a nice little lot of rare wild orchids and saxifrages. We noticed a particularly fine plant of the rare and difficult Meconopsis Aculeata amongst Messrs. Heath and Sons' exhibit. One of the most striking features among the hardy flowers were the new hybrid Trollinses. We were particularly struck with King George V. and Lemon Queen, shown by Mr. James Cocker, of Aberdeen, and those of Messrs. Harkness. Primula Bullegana was once more shown by Messrs. Bees, but the most remarkable primula in the Show was a hybrid which we predicted a considerable time ago—namely, Colburyensis, which is the result of crossing Pulverulenta with Cockburniana. It was brought by Mr. Charles Louch. Sweet-peas were rather poor in substance at this early date. An excellent new variety is Melba, of a salmon colour. In view of the rapidly approaching Coronation much interest centred upon carnations. The finest novelty was Messrs. Young's immense dark crimson seedling, Duchess of Devonshire. The same firm also had fine plants of the yellow Cecilia and the brilliant red Britannia. Mr. H. Burnett had three grand novelties in R. F. Felton, a hybrid from Mrs. Burnet and Enchantress, Mrs. C. F. Raphael, cherry-red, of great size and substance, and Orpheus, a fancy composed of carmine pencillings on a yellow ground.

May-flowering tulips, as usual, formed a prominent feature of the Show. Messrs. Barr had a striking mauve parrot appropriately named "Sensation." In Messrs. Lilley's tastefully-arranged collection of bulbous flowers one had a grand opportunity of admiring to the full the exquisite little Tris Pavonia.

Roses hardly came up to one's expectations. Everybody will, however, welcome the advent of a red Dorothy named Excelsa. A magnificent weeping standard of it was to be seen amongst Messrs. Paul and Sons' display. Weeping standard roses are deservedly gaining in popularity every year. A beautiful white hybrid Wichuriana was Sylvia, shown by William Paul, who also had Portia.

In the orchid tent we noticed two fine sprays of Odontioda Lambeauiana, and a particularly fine group of Miltonia St. André. A mass of the new perpetual-flowering pink C. H. Herbert attracted much attention. Many gems were to be found in the obscure depths of the novelty tent. Three magnificent new rhododendrons were Starfish and Corona (J. Waterer) and Glory of Littleworth (Miss Mangles).

Their Majesties the King and Queen visited the Show early on Tuesday, and displayed the greatest interest in the exhibits.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

POETRY AND VERSE—III.

Mirage: Poems. By DOUGLAS AINSLIE. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

Characters in Outline. By J. R. MCCLYMONT, M.A. Edin. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Poems. By EMERY POTTLE. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net.)

A Book of Sacred Verse. Compiled and Edited by W. A. KNIGHT. (The R.T.S. 3s. 6d. net.)

To hold the critical balance truly when judging compositions so uneven as those which appear in Mr. Ainslie's book "Mirage" is not an easy matter. We have excellent work on one page, poor work on another; here a lyric that charms, there a succession of rhymes run riot. "Tosses" and "proboscis," "crest we" and "rest ye," "north spring" and "offspring," "hearken" and "bark in" are "rhymes" which occur in "The Chinese Pleasaunce," and here are a couple of passages from the same poem:—

Hardly in the gloom ye notice
How the sky he would be climbing;
Lo! the moon herself his boat is:
See him in her arms reclining!
Sometimes friends will come to visit
Him they rightly count as their friend,
And the hours in pleasures licit
Pass we in pavilion curtained . . .

Shall we pass into my grotto,
Which grows wider as ye enter,
Till it form a dome sun-shot through?
Sun and honeysuckle blent there!

In spite of his admission in the preface that the majority of the poems in "Mirage" had been written before he had "a definite conception of the true nature of art," Mr. Ainslie should have suppressed such work for the sake of his reputation, since other portions of his book show that he can write true poetry, free from such scandalous rhyming, possessing fine thought and a gift of harmony. The legend of "Good Friday's Hoopoe" is treated in precisely the quaint, undecorated style that the subject demands. The bird flies before Christ to shield His face from the sun, and is asked what reward shall be its portion:—

"Sir," quoth the Hoopoe, "nought for me;
I crave but to remain
The little grey bird that shielded Thee
And strove to ease Thy pain."

The ingenious Sapphics, entitled "Love at Versailles," are a successful attempt at a difficult form. Later in the volume Mr. Ainslie gives us some very pretty lyrics and a few readable sonnets, and one "Nocturne," which is perhaps the best and most delicately-written page in the whole book. We quote the last stanza:—

Hark to the rustling wind among
The shadows of the grove;
It is my voice in ancient song
Of immemorial love.
And now its murmurs die away,
And calm the sleeping world;
Do thou sleep too, yet keep till day
This on thy bosom furled.

We welcome Mr. Ainslie's real poems, but we wish he had had the critical acumen to delete such pieces as "The Chinese Pleasaunce."

Many of the "Characters in Outline" of Mr. McClymont are very pleasing, and although he has at times rather a heavy touch—much too heavy, for instance, for the roundels and madrigals which he essays—some of his lyrics ring with a very delicate music. The "Love-song of a Faun" excels in this; we give the closing stanza:—

Love among the lilies,
Wake and hie thee home,
Lest Diana straying,
Stag or hunter slaying,
Take thee for her own,
And, my heart dismaying,
Bid me dwell alone.

Here we can almost forgive the careless rhyming for the sake of the simplicity and charm of the form. If the author had cultivated simplicity more his volume would have gained in value; his sonnet-sequences suffer much from obscurity, and one sonnet on p. 70 is so incoherent as to be almost unintelligible. Others, less involved, stand out pleasantly by contrast, as the one on p. 60—"Thou art Astarte; lo, a hymn I bring," and numbers vi. and vii. in "The Church and the World." Evidence of the heavy touch to which we referred just now is plain when Mr. McClymont attempts the French forms, which require daintiness above everything; and no poet should begin a song "to a linnet" with the extraordinary line "Away with incubi"! Such experiments are dangerous to readers with weak hearts.

The only way to do thorough justice to the "Poems" of Mr. Emery Pottle would be to quote freely, and in a short review this is impossible. Every two or three pages a lyric or a sonnet occurs which makes direct appeal, not only to the intellect, but to the heart, by its happy expression of a happy or poignant thought. Here is one pretty trifle from the section entitled "In the Open":—

Pan plucked a rose all dripping sweet
With sunny dawn; all frail and cool
With evening, as a new-made moon
Asleep within a forest pool.
He laid the rose at Nature's feet
And some one called it June.

We quote also a poem in a sterner mould, "Temptation," for the sake of its fine image:—

. . . And still the ancient struggle frets my heart—
Abating now and lulling, till grim fears depart
From me, and I see peace almost within my hands;
Then, in impetuous bound, against my hope's frail wall,
Or subtly stealing to my latticed calm with luring call—
Again the wrestler comes.
Bruisèd upon the bloody sands
He leaves me—sick with shame of fresh defeat,
Or sobbing o'er a victory as stern as sweet.

The longest poem in the book describes the mood of one who waits, hoping yet fearing, watching a candle-flame which may signify by its extinction the death of a loved one within the room; the whole thing is sharp with a sense of pain, of overpowering emotion. Not one of the verses is negligible—all, even those which might be termed merely pretty efforts suitable for song, are well written and possess that quality which places them within the charmed circle of literature.

Professor Knight's admirable collection of sacred verse is not, as he explains in his preface, intended for use as a devotional manual; it is rather a literary work for private reading and study. This preface, by the way, we recommend all who see the book to read carefully; it is written in Professor Knight's well-known scholarly style, and really forms an illuminating essay on the difficult subject of religious poetry. His plea that "all the highest poetry of the world is religious, when that word is widened out and rightly understood," might seem to make his task of selection overwhelmingly hard; but, though we do not profess to have read the 550 pages from beginning to end, as far as we can see from a careful examination the volume is a true literary treasure. Many very beautiful and very familiar stanzas will be found within its covers, and many, doubtless, which are not often seen; and when we say that the dates of the various compositions are spread over five centuries it will be obvious how great a store of material has been drawn upon for Professor Knight's anthology.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

HIGH AND LOW LIFE IN INDIA

Among Indian Rajahs and Ryots. By Sir Andrew H. L. Fraser, K.C.S.I. (Seeley and Co. 18s. net.)

Autobiography has this advantage over ordinary biography that the author-subject, having a full knowledge of all the facts, can the more easily select whatever he prefers for publication, and is under no obligation to present the whole truth and nothing but the truth. No one expects him to acknowledge any mistakes or any shortcomings in the actions of his official life. Sir Andrew Fraser at any rate conveys the idea that he has nothing to regret, and that he has thoroughly enjoyed his life in India, if not in the best of all possible worlds.

His aim in these recollections and impressions of thirty-seven years of work and sport in India has been to convey some idea to the ordinary British imagination of the life that Europeans live in India, and of the peoples among whom that life is spent. He has not aimed at giving either a scientific or statistical account of India and its affairs, but merely at communicating in a simple way some impressions of life and work. His intention has been to deal chiefly with that which is easily imagined by residents in this country. The title of his book has therefore been well chosen. "Among Indian Rajahs and Ryots" expresses his object, that he will treat of the peoples of India from the highest to the lowest. The result is not so amusing, perhaps, as Mr. J. H. Rivett-Carnac's "Many Memories," nor so informing as Sir Bampfylde Fuller's "Studies of Indian Life and Sentiment," and it may be faint praise to say that it is sounder and more accurate than the vapourings of Mr. Keir Hardie, or of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in "The Awakening of India." A career of thirty-seven years is calculated to be a better qualification for writing than visits of a few weeks. Sir Andrew claims to know more of the country probably than most men, as he not only served for many years in one Province—obviously the Central Provinces—and for five years in another—clearly Bengal—but he has also visited every Province in India twice on Government Commissions, and seen almost every important native State. He was a member of the Hemp Drugs Commission in 1893, and President of the Police Commission nine years later, which certainly gave him unique opportunites of visiting all parts of India. Thus he was enabled, no doubt, to confer with a number of officials and to examine witnesses, but otherwise his tours must have resembled those of globe-trotters. Only lengthened residence in a Province can justify an officer in speaking with authority. It is therefore better for a Province to be governed by an officer who has long served in it, as Sir Andrew himself shows in the case of Sir John Morris in the Central Provinces. Bengal is said to have suffered much in the past by the appointment, as Lieutenant-Governors, of officers unacquainted with the Province or the Bengali character.

The main conclusion formed in the mind after perusing this book is that the author is often lecturing, sermonising, preaching; and we cannot help remembering what we have heard somewhere—that Sir Andrew, while Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, was in the habit of, literally, preaching. He evidently has an excellent memory, a copiousness of language, and a good supply of records for reference. After all, any Indian official of long standing must have a large repertoire of official cases and of humorous stories, and if he has a tendency to dogmatise there is nothing easier than to dictate such accumulations to a shorthand-writer, add some didactic observations, and the thing is done. The worst of it is that such a book appeals to only a limited circle. The Anglo-Indian will look at it to see what one of their number has to say, but the ordinary public care very little to know about Rajahs and ryots, about district life, missions, the police, the training of young civilians, and the treatment of natives of India, upon which subjects the author expatiates in the fullness of his heart. Even the average Englishman, however, would be interested to read that "the tiger does not ordinarily attack man. I have myself, when unarmed, met a tiger face to face in the jungle, and he has turned away growling at the disturbance, but altogether disinclined to enter into the lists with me, not knowing his advantage;" or, again, how the writer killed a charging bull buffalo at ten yards' distance.

It is on the subject above mentioned, and others besides, that Sir Andrew has something to say worth reading. He preaches the desirability of indoctrinating young officers with proper principles of treating Indians of all classes with courtesy and firmness, of appealing to their common humanity, and of allowing opportunities for the representation of requests, even though refusals may be necessary. He is perfectly right in insisting on the importance of officers going to the spot, and discussing difficulties coram populo, when the truth will out. He expresses himself with some redundance, indeed with repetition, on the ignorance of English lawyers, both as counsel and as judges. "If modern conditions," he writes, "demand more of legal training than formerly on the bench, the necessity should be met not by reducing the number of civilian judges, but by improving their legal training. Men with Indian and local knowledge are as necessary as ever." Sir Andrew strongly condemns the mutual ignorance of the High Court and the people. In his general defence of the police—not as being perfect, but as having done splendid work since their improvement in consequence of the Police Commission—he remarks that "the hasty condemnation or denunciation of the police by judicial officers is much to be deprecated." As in England, the police in India are not immaculate, but with proper supervision and better pay they are doing better and are capable of further improvement. It is not difficult to dwell forcibly on the erroneous views propagated regarding the separation of judicial and executive functions, which he shows to have been engineered by lawyers for their own advantage. But he is surely wrong in supposing that the question has been set at rest. Surely Lord Curzon has said somewhere that the papers were too voluminous for him to tackle. Sir Andrew repeats himself when he writes about the desirability of securing for Indians sound technical and scientific, industrial education in India rather than in England; and, though he again repeats himself, he very properly enforces the principle that men may rightly be appointed to certain Boards, local bodies, or Councils, as representatives of interests, but should only be appointed to high executive offices as the best selections for the post, capable of holding the scales justly and between conflicting interests. As to unrest, he has nothing particularly new to say, and the obvious question arises, why did he not stop it? This is just one of the points that an autobiographer can refrain from answering. Possibly the truth may be disclosed some day. He more than hints that the Local Governments did not possess adequate powers of repression, and that much pressure was necessary to induce the Government of India to pass adequate measures. Many would like to know how far he personally applied pressure. Judgment must be suspended until the real responsibility is clear.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are a number of slipshod mistakes which should not have occurred. Secretariate is an unusual spelling. Girdleston, Anthony, Bamfylde, Sangor, Murshiabad are certainly wrong. Patel is a Maratha word, not only a Nagpur name for a village headman. An officer, Jeffcoat, is five times called a lieutenant and once a captain within three pages. His Majesty, as Prince of Wales, visited India in 1905-6, and not in 1904 as stated. More care should have been taken in correcting the proofs. But, on the whole, this book will attract attention in Anglo-Indian circles; and it will be quoted at missionary meetings as advocating the cause of missions, of which the author had special knowledge from his birth.

THE SPANISH "DREYFUS CASE"

The Life, Trial, and Death of Francisco Ferrer. By WILLIAM ARCHER. With Twenty Illustrations. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

WE congratulate Mr. Archer on the very temperate tone of his book. Some other writers in discussing the subject with which he deals have scattered lurid adjectives broadcast to no useful purpose. The question whether Francisco Ferrer was really the "author and chief" of the Barcelona rising of July, 1909, whether he was tried in accordance with general principles of equity and rightly convicted and executed is of importance, because, as all persons acquainted with the state of Spain at the present time are aware, it undoubtedly affects the Monarchy's stability. The case has various points of resemblance with the famous Dreyfus affair in France, notably because it has placed the Roman Catholic Church and the Army in direct antagonism with other elements in the nation, but it differs from it because the irretrievable having happened, there is no longer a possibility of offering proper reparation. At the same time, it has influenced Spanish political parties to such a degree that we are glad to have it set forth in a dispassionate narrative like that of Mr. Archer, who has exerted himself to steer clear of both religious bigotry and anti-religious fanaticism. He certainly has sympathy for Ferrer, as we all must have if we come to the conclusion that he was wrongly put to death; but there is no endeavour to disguise Ferrer's faults. We may pass over the latter's matrimonial troubles and the attempt which his wife made on his life. The marriage was an unhappy one, and there were faults on both sides, as the children of the union sorrowfully admit. There are indications that Ferrer was at one moment of his career inclined to militant Anarchism, but, in any case, he renounced it to devote himself to educational work, opening a rationalist school in which children were taught several things which we certainly reprobate, though we do not feel that they tended in any way to crimes of violence. The Spanish authorities, who, unfortunately, are so neglectful of education (their country's greatest need), had it in their power to suppress Ferrer's teaching if they objected to it, but they allowed it to continue undisturbed for over five years. When, however, Mateo Morral flung the bomb which killed and injured so many people on the occasion of the marriage of King Alfonso and Princess Ena in 1906, Ferrer was tried as an accomplice in that crime. Much to the chagrin of the clericalists, he was acquitted of the charge, and there was, in our opinion, the best of reasons for disbelieving it. Ferrer and Morral certainly knew each other, and had even been associated in educational work, but both had fallen in love with the same beautiful woman, Soledad Villafranca, and she had chosen Ferrer in preference to Morral. From that moment the two men could no longer work together, but were inevitably, irreparably sundered. It was virtually the old story told by the fabulist: "Deux coqs vivaient en paix; survint une poule, et voilà la guerre allumée."

But the real point at issue is the Barcelona rising, in respect to which we feel that, although Ferrer may not have been blameless, he was by no means its instigator and leader. Its real causes are well set forth in Mr. Archer's pages, and although some have alleged that Ferrer was at least morally responsible for it, by reason of the anti-clericalist teaching at his school, it seems to us very far-fetched to suppose that this school, at which from first to last over a period of some five years less than three hundred pupils were educated, and which appears also to have been closed for nearly three years prior to the rebellion, was really the fons et origo thereof. In reality the rising was caused by the much more important factors which Mr. Archer enumerates; and instead of Ferrer, the miscalled anarchist, having incited the people to violence and incendiarism, that was chiefly the vile and wicked work of the two Republican leaders, Don Alejandro Lerroux and Don Emiliano Iglesias (the latter of whom is still a member of the Cortes), in their journal El Progreso, which forty-eight hours before the outburst recalled with pride "the virile days" of 1835, when the convents of Barcelona had been assailed and burnt! But Ferrer's school and his attempts to revive it had undoubtedly drawn on him the bitter animosity of extreme clericalists, and it unhappily seems certain that he suffered more on account of his hostility to the Roman Catholic Church than on account of anything he may have said or done in or around Barcelona during the rising, on which last points the evidence for the prosecution, as marshalled by Mr. Archer, is of the flimsiest character. We strongly disapprove of Ferrer's fanatical anti-religious views, but no Englishman worthy of the name would nowadays send any one to execution because he rejected a creed and called it false.

Ferrer was tried under military law in circumstances which are foreign to the English sense of fairness, and was shot in all haste, almost on the eve of the assembling of the Cortes, in order, so it seems, that all appeals for leniency on his behalf might prove fruitless. It is a nice point whether Señor Maura, the Conservative Premier, or Señor Moret, the Liberal leader, at that time, was the more responsible for the execution. Mr. Archer prints but does not guarantee some letters said to have been exchanged by those statesmen, and which, if genuine, tend, in our opinion, to cast the greater responsibility on the latter one. In any case the affair has done harm to virtually all the constitutional parties in Spain. It pursues each successive ministry even as the Dreyfus case pursued Cabinet after Cabinet in France; and it is of the nature of those fateful causes célèbres—such as the Trial of the Seven Bishops in England and the Diamond Necklace affair in France—which go far to undermine a régime. We have certainly not yet heard the last of it. Meantime English readers will find the facts clearly set out in Mr. Archer's volume, and if they cannot always see eye to eye with him in regard to every point of the case, they will at least find in the many documents he prints all the material necessary to enable them to form their own opinion of one of the most curious and, with respect to its results, most important trials of contemporary times. The book is illustrated with interesting portraits and views, among the former of which we may particularly call attention to one of Ferrer's devoted querida, Señora Villafranca, whose beauty is beyond question.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

NATURE'S BLITHE SPIRITS

The Airy Way. By GEORGE A. B. DEWAR. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)

THE gifted author of the "Glamour of the Earth" now writes of the Glamour of the Air. In many other books Mr. Dewar has shown himself a remarkably keen and patient observer of Nature. "The Airy Way" is partly an original study of the varying flights of birds and insects; but the author admits that he is puzzled by the boundless mysteries of the "minutiæ of natural flight." Why should pigeons glide with their wings raised up at an angle of 45deg. from the body, while other birds glide with full-stretched wings laid horizontally? Gulls stop dead in the wind, and turn clean round as if fixed on a pivot. Some birds soar spirally into the heights. Some butterflies, having flown a few yards, make a little movement which suggests a glide. It is not possible, says Mr. Dewar, to assign these volitations "to their right causes and places in the system of flight." We agree that it may be very difficult to account for all variations and peculiarities, but we are inclined to think that many are due to natural causes, simple enough. Aerial currents and vortices, to whose perpendicular, horizontal, or whirling motions all flying creatures must possess instantaneous adaptation, must surely account for endless variations. The perpetual search for the most minute forms of food by creatures possessing the keenest powers of sight and hearing is another factor. The extensive curves and sweeping flights of the Australian needle-tailed swifts are taken in pursuit of insects that soar in calm weather at an immense elevation.

According to modern custom, we are provided with a short review of this book on the paper wrapper, and are told that "'The Airy Way' will naturally be read by the large body of people interested in aviation or artificial flight." Having read it very carefully, we are bound to say that there is little of practical suggestion for the aviator, whose greatest difficulty lies in the enormous weight of his machine. Very little extra weight makes the progress of even the largest and best bird flyers impossible. The wandering albatross, which can sail along for days without rest, becomes incapable and falls to the water after eating a piece of blubber weighing only a few pounds. In estimating the marvellous powers of flight Mr. Dewar says nothing of birds' hollow bones and air-sacs in communication with the lungs, which enable them to force the hot and rarefied air from the lungs into the legs, upper wingbone, and breastbone, and, in some cases, even into part of the skull. He rejects the theories of Borelli and Marey that in a bird's flight the air acts obliquely on the wings in movement, which take a wedge-like form. He says that though observation reveals only a plain up and down stroke of the wings, with no glimpse of the wing striking forward in its downward beat, "we know that it does and must strike so." Hence he believes in a screw-like action, but he gives no scientific explanation of his theory. Nor does he allude to the well-known assistance to flight provided by feather structure and action. On the down-stroke the wing feathers beat the air with their flat sides, while on the return for another stroke the sharp edges are presented perpendicularly, so that the disturbed air strikes the flat sides horizontally with impelling force. This action is due to the curious formation of the wing muscles, which give a slight and involuntary turn as the wing is thrown back after making the stroke. But this is not a book of scientific anatomy. Its great charm lies in the beautiful descriptions of joyous Nature, in which the author revels. He believes that birds soar aloft for the sheer joy of glorious flight: as Shelley of the skylark:—

> In the golden lightning
> Of the sunken sun,
> O'er which clouds are bright'ning,
> Thou dost float and run,
> Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun.

How true it is that all the joy of the fritillary is gone when we look at a dead specimen in a case! "Divide a butterfly into ten thousand parts of beauty and interest, and scarcely one ten-thousandth of the whole can be realised by looking at the dead, rigid specimen." All true lovers of Nature will find rare delight in the author's simple and fine expression of the purest joys. He writes not only of the flight of birds in the Airy Way, but of "the scene in which a bird sings: a lark in the blue, a missel-thrush in stormy April woods, a song-thrush in the calm of the June dusk, a sedge-warbler in the deep of the river night. One cannot separate in thought a bird's song from these accompaniments, and find its value still great. The charm of the scene, the spirit and life of the singer itself, are a large part of the pleasure." And so we pass on from page to page and find pleasant converse with "the tenderness of beech trees' drooping sprays at their earliest greening," "the rich flower scents of June," "the poppy field lit by the sun of a July afternoon," "the panorama of purple hill," "the peculiar character of the light on halcyon mornings in the first part of autumn," "the sweet cry of curlews on the strand after dark," "the sights and sounds of the English summer in a wood or by a stream, which can sometimes be a small salve for sorrow." There is no foolish sentimentalism or moralising, yet a very occasional sentence like this, with which we conclude, is splendid—"A bird's nest, delicately made and set in a choice site . . . may make the finder forget for a little while the disappointments of life and the mistakes which can be dwelt on too much." We may add that "The Airy Way," a poem in prose, is a tonic exhilarating like the air of the moor and the ripple of the mountain trout-stream.

THE DECLINE OF HOME RULE

Irish Affairs and the Home Rule Question. A Comparison of the Attitude of Political Parties towards Irish Problems. By PHILIP G. CAMBRAY. With an Introduction by the MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY, K.G. (John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)

ALTHOUGH Mr. Cambray's little volume on Irish affairs has no pretensions to literary merit it will nevertheless be welcomed as a work coming at an appropriate moment when the Irish problem, after a lapse of many years, threatens once again to loom large in the public eye.

In the early pages of this book the author makes it abundantly clear that he is avowedly an enemy of Mr. Redmond's political programme in Ireland; and it must be said that throughout the volume a strong case is established in defence of the maintenance of the Union with Great Britain. After a careful perusal of these pages one feels constrained to inquire whether the Irish people themselves or the Liberal party in Great Britain have at all any serious yearnings for the establishment of an Irish Parliament on Irish soil.

Since the overwhelming rejection of Mr. Gladstone's last effort in this direction at the hands of the electors in 1895 the Liberal party has allowed the question to slumber, and has never attempted to awaken it even in the prosperous days of their record majority in 1905. Not indeed until Mr. Asquith found himself absolutely dependent on Mr. Redmond for a party support at Westminster did the Liberal chief attempt to "toe the line" on the great problem which he knew to be the undoing of the Leader whom he followed in 1886 and 1893.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

As recently as on the eve of the General Election of December, 1910, although Mr. Asquith gave a half-hearted promise in his Albert Hall speech to include Home Rule in his varied programme, he and 56 per cent. of the Liberal and Labour candidates omitted all mention of the subject in their momentous addresses to the constituencies during the Election of December, 1910. It is not surprising, as our author points out, that those of the Liberal party who openly advocated Ireland's national independence did so not because it was really essential for Ireland herself, but because the conduct of Irish affairs at Westminster clogged the wheels in so far as other general legislation was concerned.

As to Ireland itself, Mr. Cambray very rightly emphasises that the urgent case for Home Rule has long since disappeared. The Legislative Acts which created land and house ownership, local government, old-age pensions, and, as far as the Irish priesthood are concerned, a Roman Catholic University—all these reforms have deadened the desire for local government which previously existed in the hearts of the Irish people. There seems to be every ground for the author's belief that the flourishing and loyal population of Ulster are more than ever steadfastly opposed to the establishment of a Redmondite Parliament in their midst.

Since the publication of this book it has been demonstrated by the Belfast correspondent of the Morning Post that £100,000 has already been subscribed to pay expenses of a great Anti-Home Rule campaign, which will be inaugurated for the purpose of "educating the predominant partner on the iniquities which will immediately follow on the granting of Home Rule." So successful has been the organisation in Ireland against the threatened establishment of Home Rule that "it is now estimated that the membership of the Unionist clubs is expected to exceed the 200,000 which existed in 1893." There can be no doubt that Ulster is desperately serious in this matter.

It cannot be wondered at, as the writer suggests, that the Ulster minority are naturally suspicious of the fair promises of toleration under a Home Rule scheme that now emanate from the Nationalist leaders. The loyalists of Ulster have every reason to remember Mr. John Dillon's speech of many years ago in which he undertook to predict that "when the Nationalists come into their own they would remember their friends and also—their enemies." How truly was this threat brought into effect when the County Councils were first established in Ireland! The unfortunate loyalists were scornfully left in the cold, and the loaves and fishes at once became the property of those who even in this small degree "came into their own." The volume further deals with the continuous bickerings that are going on and have been going on amongst the Irish Nationalist leaders for well-nigh over a period of twenty years.

We strongly and cordially recommend this instructive volume as a valuable contribution to the up-to-date political history of Ireland. It will prove a revelation to those who lightly talk of handing over the destinies of Ireland to Mr. John Redmond and his present following at Westminster. The book has the exceptional advantage of the benediction of Lord Londonderry, who, as an old student of Irish politics, contributes a masterly introduction to its pages.

COUNTY MEMORIALS

Memorials of Old Lincolnshire. Edited by E. Mansel Sympson, M.A., M.D.

Memorials of Old Leicestershire. Edited by Alice Dryden. (George Allen and Sons. 15s. each net.)

These handsome volumes belong to a series of Memorials of the Counties of England, of which the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield, F.S.A., is the general editor, while each volume is the work of several contributors, according to a growing modern custom which, although it secures the interest of specialists in some cases, produces somewhat uneven results, and a certain absence of unity in treatment. These defects, however, are not so likely to be apparent in archæological as in historical writings, yet in the compilation of the volumes before us we observe no evidence of any scheme or method of arrangement. There is rather a collection of essays, learned and for the most part well written, but eclectic, according to the interest or predilection of the writers. The Lincoln volume is chiefly concerned with churches. In the Leicestershire volume churches are omitted with the exception of one very interesting notice of the state of churches in the time of Charles II.; while tombs, monuments, and effigies fill considerable space, and are carefully examined by Mr. W. S. Weatherley. One country house in Lincolnshire is described, several in Leicestershire.

The Prehistoric Roads and Vestiges of Paganism in Leicestershire are both good articles, but these subjects are unnoticed in the Lincoln book. It must be admitted that, able though many of these essays are, the general result has to be described as random archæology. Ethnology, folklore, anthropology, history, ecclesiology, ancient houses and families, all belong to County Memorials, and each might find a place, though none could be treated exhaustively, in a single well-arranged volume.

Passing from this general criticism to the particular articles in these books, we find much valuable and interesting information, as might be expected from the number of scholarly contributors. Space will permit the consideration of only a few of the essays. Lincolnshire is famed for the number and interest of its chancel-screens, and Dr. Mansel Sympson, who has already written elsewhere on this subject, has an excellent paper on the most important, besides a good deal of general information on the origin and use of screens. The same writer describes Tattershall Castle and Church, while Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson writes on the Saxon Churches of the County, and his essay suggests the better description of Early Romanesque.

Boston, Grantham, and Stamford form the subject of three separate papers, and in another there is an account of the progress of the Great Civil War in Lincolnshire, by Mr. E. H. R. Tatham, who also writes in an earlier paper of the Roman occupation. In a book in which so much is said of churches, it is curious that there is no reference to fonts, seeing that Lincolnshire possesses such a great variety, both of Norman and Gothic styles; nor to the fourteen cases where the old altar stones still remain.

The Leicestershire volume opens with an article on Historic Leicestershire, by the Editor. Even as an "Introduction . . . to link the papers together," this is chronologically misplaced, as it practically begins with the Danish Invasion, and yet precedes the valuable papers of Mr. A. R. Holwood on Prehistoric Leicestershire, and on the Roman and Anglo-Saxon periods. The paper on the Churches in the time of Charles I. has some interesting items, quarried by Mr. A. Percival Moore, as Registrar of the Archdeaconry of Leicester. In the Registry is a letter, dated December 7th, 1639, from one Ric. Langham, parson of Bottesford who wishes to cite a certain factious squire, who has made, inter alia, the following vexatious complaints of his conduct—to wit:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> That standing in my seate in y^e^ Chancell (as sometimes I doe) to observe how my people resort to y^e^ Church, hee saies I looke through y^e^ grates as a lyon upon dogges and Beares: and that when I come up the Church at y^e^ entrance of the Chancell dore (doeing my humble duty towards y^e^ aultar) Doe you not see (saith hee) how he worships stocks and stones?

Humorous as this is in one aspect, the Vicar evidently lacked a sense of humour, for he continues: "Whether I shall deal with him only in y^e^ Court at Leicester or in y^e^ High Commission I leave to your wisdom."

Both these volumes are amply illustrated by a large number of full-page pictures from drawings and photographs. They are well worth a place in the library of the antiquary.

WAGNER IN SHIRT-SLEEVES

Œuvres en Prose de Richard Wagner. Tome VI. Translated into French by J. G. Prod'homme et F. Caillé. (Delagrave, Paris. 2f. 50c.)

The problem of Wagner is always a difficult one. That a genius of the first order should have found it necessary to justify his works in volume after volume of bewildering prose, instead of letting these works speak for themselves, is one of those outrageous facts that defy satisfactory explanation. Our chief consolation is that the composer himself, with his scanty stock of humour, felt the incongruity to the full. Again and again he utters vows—made to be broken—that he will have done this time once and for all with the scribbling habit. But here we have the sixth volume, not by any means the last, of a French version of his prose works.

A special interest attaches to this volume through the fact that we have just passed the fiftieth anniversary of the violent rejection of "Tannhäuser" at the Paris Opera, and that we get a glimpse of the composer's mind on the eve of the battle. He expresses his hopes and fears, especially the former, and looks forward to the victory of his novel ideas. We cannot but feel that he comes perilously near at times to fatuity when he disclaims all desire for personal glory, but we are won back by his courage under defeat. It is this quality that makes his greatness as a man, though this greatness is too often obscured by the persistent intrusion of self into the impersonal fields of art. The meaner Wagner is too often before our eyes in these pages; he cannot for a moment forget the profanum vulgus; he rejects it, and dissects it; he addresses his operas and his explanations alike to his "friends." He expresses his vague discontent with the world in the most insufferable terms—worthy of the superior young man incompris, who has just come down from his University as a social and academical failure—"my instinct impelled me towards an unknown that is pure, chaste, and virginal, towards the eventual satisfaction of a noble, but withal essentially sensual, desire, but at the same time such a desire as contemporary frivolity could by no means satisfy." His sojourn in France has no charms for him; he feels an irresistible antipathy for the French language, and, in speaking of Paris, he cannot keep clear of such dreary clichés as "the modern Babylon." We cannot avoid the feeling that, in rejecting "Tannhäuser," the Parisians were at least as much justified, from a patriotic point of view, as they were the other day in sabotant "Après Moi."

We think it is not too much to say that Wagner's name would have stood just as high to-day if he had not put his name to a single one of his "Works in Prose." Perhaps his excuse lies in the peculiar position of opera at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The debate was not yet over—it had really only begun—as to whether opera was a legitimate form of art; to many it seemed a monstrous and hybrid birth. Wagner has at any rate shown in his prose (in his musical works he has demonstrated it yet more conclusively) that the opera is a true form of art. He goes back to the beginnings of European drama, and shows that the stage-play, the symphony, and the ballet are all children of a common parent, and once lived under the same roof. But we have no doubt at all that the "Ring" would have been played and have conquered the world if its author had kept silence "even from good words," though, as he might have added with conviction, "it was pain and grief to me."

In the present volume—Number VI. (III., IV., and V. have not yet seen the light)—we have two of Wagner's Apologiae. We may recommend the second. The French translators point out that he has shown a little of the wisdom of the serpent in this plaidoirie; he has suppressed much, and has endeavoured to give a consecutive account of his development and his theories. He is addressing a Frenchman on the eve of the battle over "Tannhaüser." He is forced to be as clear and as conciliatory as it is in his nature to be. He is, moreover, several years older. As to the earlier autobiography and apology, it contains much that is excellent and much that is almost intolerable. To forget the latter and to confirm the former we can think of only one specific—to take the first opportunity of hearing or rehearing "Tristan" or the "Walküre." A word of praise is due to the translators. However we may regret Wagner's mania for self-justification, and the extent to which he indulged it, his apologetics have become an essential part of the literature of music, and French has a decided advantage over German as a vehicle for somewhat nebulous theorising.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Knox's Ceylon, with Autobiography. (James MacLehose and Sons, Glasgow. 12s. 6d. net.)

A reprint of the "Historical Relation of Ceylon" cannot fail to meet with a cordial welcome from the intrinsic interest of the work that was first published in the year 1681. The volume now issued, however, represents far more than a mere reprint, since within it is included for the first time the relation by Robert Knox himself of the events of his lifetime subsequent to his deliverance from captivity. That this latter is now enabled to see the light is due to the efforts of the late Mr. Donald Ferguson, whose researches were rewarded last year by the discovery of the manuscript in the Bodleian Library. To what extent the publication has benefited from the additional matter will be clearly evident from a perusal of the volume.

There are probably few autobiographies in existence that reveal the characters of their authors more ingenuously than that of the famous Robert Knox. A Puritan who set out upon his strange adventures convinced of his special share of Divine protection, he went his way, blending hardihood with caution, thanking the Lord for full cargoes of slaves, accepting a rebuff in the course of his mercantile sharp practices as a punishment from above of a want of faith, and submitted to hardships and captivity in the assurance that in the end his star would rise in the ascendant once again. The temper of the sturdy British sailors, prisoners in Ceylon, is admirably illustrated from the fact that at the beginning of their captivity, ere they had learned of the general meagreness of the native diet, "each man took the limb of an hen in his hand, and marched rank and file in order thro the streets with it as a sign to the great men, whereby they might see, how illy they were served." As to Robert Knox himself, although his shrewdness in the trade in which he was permitted to indulge rendered him comparatively wealthy, he had no mind to forego the least of the privileges accorded him as a prisoner of State. Thus, when billeted upon some impoverished Cingalese villagers, he complained of his fare to the King, although he admits that "I was better able to live without it than they to give it me." After which Knox turned usurer, and despoiled his capturers in earnest.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Undoubtedly the sole difference between Knox and many amateur buccaneers of wilder repute lay in the fact that the former quoted Scripture in place of oaths. Yet this sanctimonious old sea-dog, who wrote so glibly of deeds that cannot stand the light of present-day morality, demands his own share of admiration. If his bargains were to be dreaded in times of peace, he was equally formidable to his enemies in periods of war, and proved staunch to his comrades in the hour of peril, Moreover, he is gratefully to be remembered for having left behind him an intimate account of the sea-life of his day that is delightful for the simplicity of its detail.

Secret Societies and the French Revolution, with Some Other Studies. By UNA BIRCH. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

MISS BIRCH has collected in this volume several papers which she originally contributed to The Edinburgh Review and The Nineteenth Century and After. Though neither exhaustive nor particularly profound, they are very acceptable, by reason especially of all that they suggest. Such is notably the case in regard to the essay which supplies the title of the volume, and another which treats of the Revolution and Religious Liberty. We are inclined to share Miss Birch's view that Freemasonry and kindred organisations were far more influential factors in bringing about the French Revolution than most historians have yet admitted, and we should like to see the subject fully treated. The recent separation of Church and State in France gives a topical interest to Miss Birch's paper on religious liberty during the revolutionary period. At the present time the subject is attracting great attention among French historians, M. Albert Mathiez alone having produced within the last twelvemonth two illuminating volumes, in which we often find him to be in agreement with Miss Birch.

Her paper on the mysterious Comte de Saint Germain leaves us still in perplexity respecting him; but that is hardly her fault, for it is virtually impossible to separate the true from the false in the case of such an elusive and enigmatical personage. At all events, every writer who has hitherto tried to do so has failed in the endeavour. Incidentally Miss Birch says that the notorious Chevalier d'Eon was lectrice to Catherine II. (she means Elizabeth) of Russia; but if she will read Count Albert Vandel's "Louis XV. et Elisabeth de Russie" and Mr. Vizetelly's "True Story of the Chevalier d'Eon," she will know what to think of that oft-repeated legend. In the last section of her book she discusses Mme de Staël and Napoleon, and to our thinking her opinion of the lady is rather too high. Mme. de Staël was by no means faultless; she stumbled more than once (occasionally very badly), and made several important mistakes. But it is undoubtedly true that she recovered her self-possession after every error, and exerted herself to regain lost ground and ascend also to a higher plane. In regard to her political foresight, it was often superior to Napoleon's; she read the future more clearly than he did, but he was, on the whole, the better judge of his contemporaries in France, at any rate, and of the manner in which an emergency should be met. That much which Mme. de Staël predicted has come true goes without saying. Let us add that Miss Birch's book is always interesting, and her style distinctly good.

Ruskin: A Study in Personality. By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. (Smith, Elder, and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

No book on Ruskin can be dull, but Mr. Benson's volume of seven lectures is certainly a little barren of surprises. In his modest preface he describes it as a sketch and not a finished portrait; "it is frankly compiled from accessible sources, but it is written with a sincere love and admiration, and with a strong belief that Ruskin's message and example have a very real truth and strength of their own, urgently needed in these hasty and impulsive days." This is well enough, but a sketch can be at least as incisive as a finished portrait, and it is just in this quality that Mr. Benson's lectures are lacking. They give us the impression neither of the critical insight born of sympathy, nor of the enthusiasm born of love. Really at times we find Ruskin a little tiresome in the twilight of Mr. Benson's appreciation, and we wish that the author had had a little less of that discrimination that neither rejects nor accepts, but appears to state a case for some remote posterity to answer. In other words we wish that Mr. Benson had let himself go.

Ruskin was an extremely bad art-critic, who rendered an immense service to English art by mixing it with morality and persuading the British public to swallow the dose whole. He made people take an interest in art by twisting it into an argument in favour of conventional morality, and there is no doubt that in his day he was extraordinarily successful. It is to be feared that now the passion for morality in art survives without the passion for art. In addition he had theories of social reform far in advance of those of his day combined with a full measure of the normal impracticability of the social reformer. He was a Conservative who did not like railways or tin chapels or Conservatives. But his position in English literature is due to the fact that he expressed himself in English of a wonderful power and beauty, and though his writing is often wrong-headed, frequently imitating and occasionally obscure, we can always take pleasure in his admirable style.

Mr. Benson's book, though, as we have said, by no means sensational, will serve very well as a handbook for any one who proposes to make a systematic study of Ruskin.

Histoires et Leçons de Choses. By MME. PAPE-CARPENTIER. Adapted and Edited by W. ROLLESTON, M.A. (Siepmann's Primary French Series.) Voyage en Grèce. By the VICOMTE DE CHATEAUBRIAND. (Adapted.) Le Tailleur de Pierres de Saint-Point. By ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE. (Adapted.) La Jacquerie. By PROSPER MÉRIMÉE. (Adapted.) Charlotte Corday. Tragédie en Cinq Actes. By FRANÇOIS PONSARD. (Siepmann's French Series for Rapid Reading.) (Macmillan and Co., 1s. each.) Le Petit Chose (Histoire d'un Enfant). By ALPHONSE DAUDET. Part I. "Le Petit Chose en Province." Adapted and Edited by S. TINDALL, M.A. (Siepmann's Advanced French Series.) (Macmillan and Co., 2s. 6d.)

THESE are three capital series, under the general editorship of Messrs. Otto Siepmann and Eugène Pellissier, for those who are studying the French language. The names of the authors are sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the contents of the volumes, each of which is well supplied with notes, vocabularies, exercises, &c. The volume belonging to the Primary Series is both entertaining and instructive, and is sure to interest the pupil, which is a great aid in the teaching of languages. Mme. Pape-Carpentier devoted the greater part of her life to the cause of education, and when quite young she helped her mother to organise, and then to manage, the first Children's Refuge founded in France. In the Series for Rapid Reading, Mérimée's "La Jacquerie" tells the story of a peasant uprising some two years after the fatal battle of Poitiers, which has been repeated to some extent during the recent riots in the Champagne district. The name given in history to the revolt is derived from "Jacques," a contemptuous cognomen bestowed on the peasant by the nobles of that time. But when the despised Jacques succeeded in getting the upper hand, feudal castles were sacked, burnt, and razed to the ground, and their inmates put to the sword. This first part of "Le Petit Chose" is Daudet's autobiography of his early days.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

De Profundis. By Oscar Wilde. (Methuen and Co. 1s. net.)
Jane. By Marie Corelli. (Methuen and Co. 1s. net.)

The first two volumes of Messrs. Methuen's new issue of shilling reprints are attractive in format and pleasantly light to handle. There is no need to make much comment upon the books themselves. Many people regard "De Profundis" as Wilde's best work, while Miss Marie Corelli is popular enough with the crowd to ensure her simple little story of "Jane" a hearty welcome.

Feuilles Éparses (Scattered Leaves). Translated into French by Marc Logé. (3f. 50c.)

This is a collection of tales, or rather fables, extracted by Lafcadio Hearn from old and little-known books—Egyptian, Assyrian, African, Hindoo, Esquimaux, Bhuddist, and Mussulman. The translation is in delightfully good French, and will appeal to those who admire fairy-tales. The book should be a favourite, as it is decidedly original in matter and treated with all Hearn's elegance and charm.

FICTION

The Girondin. By Hilaire Belloc. (Nelson. 2s.)

Many stories have been written of the fateful year 1792, when France was aflame and adventures were to be had without the seeking, and, by attempting the grand style and the large scale, many have failed. Mr. Belloc takes his young Girondin hero, lover and adventurer, through a very short course, and closes his story with death; but he succeeds, and his touch is unmistakable. Sometimes he is poking fun at Georges Boutroux, sometimes he is full of admiration for him; sometimes, again, in the garb of a wise, witty showman with a soul above earthly things, he seems to point out the insignificance, the uselessness of the toil and trouble, the marching and countermarching, the noise and bewilderment, that go to make a revolution. Always he carries the reader with him by reason of that confidential, sympathetic quality which, when he will, can hold us in a magic spell. His style on some pages of this brief romance is exceptionally beautiful—reminiscent, perhaps, of the book of Ruth; take, for example, a few sentences from the chapter where "a lover finds himself in the dark." Boutroux is in hiding at a charcoal-burner's hut; the young girl who sheltered him speaks:

> "You will stay here," she said. "You must not move, and you must trust me. I will bring you food."
>
> "There will never be a time," he said, "that you may come, whether you bring me food or no, but I shall feed. And even when you are not here, I shall feed in a fashion upon a shade."
>
> She would not answer him. She put the yoke upon her graceful shoulders so that they were bent to her labour, she straightened herself and swung the pails and went out to the field—short-kilted, walking strongly, and with the morning upon her. He saw her for but a moment as she passed the door, but almost immediately, as she left him, there came palely through that same entry the first ray of the sun; it bore with it a sort of miraculous enlivenment and a changing of all things as it came.

The whole story we will not recount here. If any reader wants a real tale of danger, love, and difficulties greatly overcome, of a young man whose spirit never failed, who lied grandly, and lived his life to the full—let him buy "The Girondin." He will want to hear more of the charming Joyeuse; but perhaps in some future volume Mr. Belloc may find her for us again.

The Leaning Spire. By George A. B. Dewar. (Alston Rivers. 2s. 6d. net.)

The present stories and sketches have a literary flavour and distinction peculiarly their own. The average English magazine story is usually a very poor affair indeed, depending on either crude sensationalism or insipid sentimentality rushed upon the public with little regard to the niceties of style. Mr. Dewar's stories have none of these defects, with the sad consequence that they will only appeal to the few. Careful workmanship marks every page, and yet somehow or other the result leaves us a little cold. His work is polished, but it is polished steel. There is the study of Olbion, who retired from the Stationery Office, took to literary work, and made a special study of foreign affairs, until he suddenly realised that it was an unprofitable and unappreciated pursuit. He turned from foreign affairs to home affairs; but that was an affair of the heart and not of politics. We particularly like a little study entitled "Dora." We remember reading it under another name in the Westminster Gazette. It is a whimsical sketch of a pink-and-white woman, who looked as if she cared only for the latest six-shilling novel. Her looks belied her. Beneath the pink-and-white, beneath the pretty doll face, there was a surprising love of the best in English literature. There is distinct charm in the way Mr. Dewar makes us realise something of a literary discovery, which he has evidently taken straight from life. "Barehills: A Hard-bitten Man," is one of the best sketches in the book. Mr. E. V. Lucas might well make use of it whenever he wants additional material for "The Open Road."

The Camera Fiend. By E. W. Hornung. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

The interest in this latest of Mr. Hornung's entertaining novels is mainly derived from a series of murders, the scenes of which the author ingeniously keeps out of sight, thereby sparing the timorous reader many thrilling horrors; indeed, one of the murders is committed before the opening of the story. "The Camera Fiend" is a Teutonic experimentalist in psychical research, who believes it is possible to photograph

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

the soul, but only at the moment of dissolution. As he has been refused permission to photograph hospital death-bed scenes, also prison executions, he resorts to murder in order to carry out his experiments and test his theory. Of one of his victims, an alcoholic licensed messenger, he says :—

> I found him asleep on a bench in Holland-walk, and, not another being in sight, and I shot him. . . . I had lost very few seconds between pulling the trigger and pressing the bulb of my pneumatic shutter, but one had to get back into position for this, and the fact remains that I was too late. The result may be found among my negatives. It is dreadfully good of the dead man, if not a unique photograph of actual death, but it lacks the least trace of the super-normal. The flight of the soul had been too quick for me.

All the characters are lifelike and well drawn, as is to be expected in a story by Mr. Hornung. His similes are witty, his humour is grim, and his tragedy is horrific. We are told in a foreword upon the outer cover that an attractive love story runs through the book, but we failed to find it: there is not a kiss, or a blush, or a tender sigh in the whole volume. But perhaps this is a little more of Mr. Hornung's grim humour. Anyhow we cannot help thinking that love would be very much out of place in such an 'orrible tale.

Dead Man's Love. By Tom Gallon. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

We suppose there must be a reading public for this kind of novel, and they are heartily welcome to it. Why Mr. Gallon, who is always a good writer and who has created some charming and lovable creatures in his time, should produce this sensationalism we do not know. The book is well put together and on the whole very well written, but composed throughout of impossible people placed in impossible situations, who never can or do interest one from the first page to the last. Dr. Bardolf Just is a distinguished medical man of the highest scientific attainments, and we are asked to accept him as a deliberate cold-blooded murderer, who, having killed her lover, then seeks to take the life of his ward, Miss Debora Matchwick. In this he is prevented by a young man named Norton Hyde, who escapes from penal servitude, where, for a change, he had been sent for a crime he did commit. We must make a point of this in justice to Mr. Gallon, as in this sort of thing the hero ex-convict is always, of course, an innocent man. Norton Hyde becomes John New, the doctor gets hanged by the valet of the man he murdered, and in the end John New inherits a huge fortune from a money-lending uncle. Ultimately he and Debora are on board ship together, and we believe and hope that when they arrive at the other end they will get married. There are two or three other characters, equally impossible and even more unnecessary.

The Great Betrayal. By Harold Wintle. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

"The Great Betrayal" is a very powerful story of an English Secretary of State who has risen from his lowly position as a nursery gardener's apprentice to his present high distinction. A German baron trying to buy English naval secrets, various society ladies, and some strong-minded service men assist in the development of plot and counter-plot. A very young K.C. (clever as young K.C.'s must be) completes the list of plotters. Plenty of local colour of the Plymouth coast, which the writer evidently knows well, and a capital description of yacht-chasing in the Channel and Irish Sea complete a very readable novel. Many of the characters in the book approximate to people in real life present and past; but we hope the author will not get in the habit of making Secretaries of State out of nursery gardeners' apprentices, house-agents, and such like. The result is not satisfactory either in books or in real life. A political crisis, and a dramatic trial for self-confessed murder concludes this remarkable story.

Paul et Virginie, suivi de la Chaumière Indienne. By Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. Mon Oncle Benjamin. By Claude Tillier. (T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net each.)

Messrs. Nelson and Sons have recently added these two volumes to the excellent series of French masterpieces they are issuing under the general title of the "Collection Nelson." The evergreen "Paul and Virginia," which so graphically depicts the simple life in the Tropics of a bygone period, will continue to be read when much of the present-day fiction has run its short course and is forgotten. "Mon Oncle Benjamin," though not so well known, is a very entertaining story and will repay reading. These handy little volumes are exceedingly well got up and fully worth the price charged for them.

FOREIGN REVIEWS

"Deutsche Rundschau"

The May number of this magazine is full of papers of genuine interest. For instance, Herr Dickhuth continues his articles on Frederick the Great and Napoleon (also the Great) in their first campaigns; while Herr von Brandt writes ably on the development of the German colonies, and Herr Heilborn publishes a part of Novalis's literary remains, including some charming verses. A more important contribution, however, is Herr Bailleu's fascinating account of the romantic love affair of Prince William of Prussia – afterwards German Kaiser, and grandfather of the present monarch—and the beautiful Princess Elisa Radziwill. For nine years the future victor of Sedan remained faithful to this early love, and, as far as was consistent with filial duty, strove to overcome the obstacles to his marriage with Elisa. But it was not to be; her birth and various political considerations combined to prevent it. There are pathetic passages in the story; but, as the world knows, Prince William ultimately found consolation in an extremely happy marriage with Augusta of Saxe-Weimar. Elisa was much less fortunate. After her severance from her royal lover she was wooed by Fürst Fritz Schwarzenberg, but that affair also ended unhappily for her, and she was barely thirty years old when she died, leaving behind her the memory of what has well been called "a life of love and sorrow."

This same issue of the Rundschau contains a number of new extracts from the diaries of Bismarck's Boswellian Under-Secretary of State, the famous Dr. Busch, to whom the world has long been indebted for much of its more intimate knowledge of the great Chancellor. The new extracts deal with the Conferences which were held in Berlin in 1880-81, with the view of carrying into effect the stipulations of the Treaty of 1878 in regard to Turkey, Greece, and Montenegro. In conjunction with Lord Odo Russell, Mr. (afterwards Viscount) Goschen took part in the negotiations, and all who are interested in Goschen

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

(whose Life by the Hon. A. D. Elliot was recently reviewed in THE ACADEMY by Sir William Bull) may be advised to read Busch's account of his intercourse with Bismarck. The latter remarked to him one day, after discussing the idea of humanitarian philanthropy in politics: "When I hear of the sufferings of a negro in China or some other remote part of the world I may mention him in my prayers, but I cannot make him an object of German policy." These new extracts from Busch are not, however, merely of anecdotal interest, but often of real historical importance.

"LA GRANDE REVUE"

In the number of this excellent periodical dated May 10th we find an important article by Senator Charles Humbert on the development of French colonisation in West Africa. It indicates that our neighbours are accomplishing great things in that part of the world, and deserves the attention of all who are interested in our own African possessions. In the same review M. Jules de Narfon continues his striking account of the Roman Catholic Church in France since its separation from the State, and brings forward a number of facts which show how disastrous the policy of Pius X. has been for French Catholics. We also note in La Grande Revue an informing article by M. Povolozky on the Russian poets of the present day, another by M. Brizon on the price of wheat and bread in France, and a third by M. Ledoux on the marked distrust and aversion which the French peasantry are displaying in respect to compulsory insurance and old-age pensions.

"LE MERCURE DE FRANCE"

There is quite a revival of interest just now in the career and work of the famous painter Ingres, who, whatever may be his reputation as a colourist, was one of the greatest draughtsmen of his own or any period. A large number of interesting letters written by him between 1837 and 1849 will be found in Le Mercure for May 1st. Hugoists should peruse M. Daumesnil's article on the source whence two books of "Les Misérables" were derived; and both Shavians and anti-Shavians may read what M. H. D. Davray has to say about Mr. Bernard Shaw and the "incoherence" and "lack of common sense" which are to be found amidst all his superficial brilliancy.. In Le Mercure for May 16th we find a curious and in some respects amusing account of La Belle Paule, the famous beauty—and, if certain legends were true, one might also say the Lady Godiva—of Toulouse. An instructive paper by M. Moine deals with German university life at the present time; while in the Revue de la Quinzaine we note M. Remy de Gourmont's lively attack on the French old-age pensions' scheme.

"LA REVUE"

M. Emile Faguet contributes a suggestive paper on the famous Calas affair to the number of La Revue (formerly La Revue des Revues) for May 1st. He virtually comes to the conclusion that Voltaire was wrong in asserting the innocence of Calas; and, however that may be, his arguments certainly deserve the attention of those who are interested in this curious historical and judicial problem. In the same issue of La Revue will be found an informing article by M. Emile Hinzelin on the revival and progress of Italy, and a lamentable account of the Russian prison system, even at the present time, by Vera Figner, the famous lady-Nihilist who spent more than twenty years in durance. Further, M. Camille Flammarion, the astronomer, continues his "Contes Philosophiques," and M. Pierre Berton begins his Theatrical Recollections with an alternately amusing and pathetic sketch of the ill-fated poet Albert Glatigny, this being concluded in the number for May 15th. The "Faits et Documents" section of La Revue for May 1st contains a hitherto unpublished letter of Guy de Maupassant's, in which the great conteur refuses to give a correspondent any particulars whatever of his career, and adds: "I do not wish the public to enter into my life. Everything that has been published about me is false, whereat I rejoice, and I take good care not to correct the errors." Judging by this, Maupassant would by no means have approved of the recently issued "Souvenirs" of his valet François.

To La Revue for May 15th M. Léon Séché contributes, with the help of many hitherto unknown documents, an authoritative account of Victor Hugo's mother and her family, upsetting almost everything which has hitherto appeared on the subject, even in works which had Hugo's approval. In the same issue we find a paper by M. d'Habloville on Fogazzaro, which is of both biographical and critical interest; and there is also a skilful criticism by M. Vermeil of Gerhart Hauptmann's play "Die Ratten." Further, the mountain-theatre of Mézières above Lausanne supplies the subject for a capital article by Professor G. Renard, who gives one to understand that all visitors to Switzerland next August will do well to repair to Mézières to hear Gluck's "Orfeo" performed there.

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

for April 29th contains a translation by M. Jacques Lux of Mr. Frank Harris's "Recollections of Verlaine," which recently appeared in THE ACADEMY; and in the same number we find several lively letters addressed by the famous song-writer Béranger to Victor Cousin, the philosopher, as well as a learned paper by M. Lionel de la Laurencie on seventeenth-century Musical Pastorals, which adds to our knowledge of the history of the French stage.

In the number for May 6th there are some more of Béranger's letters, and a curious account by M. J. Durand of the career and martyrdom of a female apostle of Babism in Persia, together with a paper by M. Lucien Maury on art critics and historians, in which we are pleased to observe a very vigorous plea for frank and resolute criticism in both literature and art. The issue for May 13th contains an article by the editor on "The Triumph of Ingres," one of whose pictures, painted when he was no less than eighty-two years old, has just been purchased for the Louvre at a cost of £6,000! To be noted in the same number—several letters written by Joséphine Soulary, the modest poet of whom Lyons is so justly proud; a pleasant paper by M. Pilon on French gardens in the seventeenth century; and a translation of an eulogistical article, recently contributed to Die Zukunft, on the English aristocracy. This will well repay perusal.

"LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE,"

an old-established publication devoted entirely to reviews of books, prints in its issue for April 29th three short but vigorous articles by ex-Abbé Loisy, criticising several recent French and German works on the Hebrew and Christian religions, their rights and laws. M. Chuquet, the editor of this periodical, is an acknowledged authority on matters pertaining to the French Revolution, and one reads with interest an article of his dealing chiefly with the position of the Roman Catholic Church during the revolutionary period.

Passing to the number for May 6th, we may direct attention to an able critique of M. Lachèvre's recent works on Théophile de Viau, Des Barreaux and St. Pavin, and also to the notices of several new books on J. J. Rousseau and other philosophers of his time. In the issue for May 13th M. Maspero criticises, with all his wonted authority, some German works on Egyptian and Babylonian antiquities; M. Loisy writes on the Babylonian epic of Gilgames, M. E. Welvert on Brissot's Memoirs, as recently annotated by M. Perroud, and M. Baldensperger on Scandinavia in French literature.

E. A. V.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A NOTE ON ASCETICISM

THE other day I was looking into a book of very amiable essays by Hugh B. Chapman, entitled "At the Back of Things."* The author's plan struck me as a capital one; he takes a couple of dozen of the most popular English proverbs and explains them, moralises them, methodises them, showing the ethical meaning that may be found beneath their obvious and material applications. "Where there's a will there's a way," "Whom the gods love die young," "A man is known by his friends," and so forth—Mr. Chapman treats them all in an amiable, pious, and improving fashion. I have no doubt that there are many quarters in which his book will be highly appreciated. Here is an example of his method; he is expounding "Absence makes the heart grow fonder:"—

> Passing beyond the personal, it is instructive to note how absence is the test of influence, for no teacher can gauge the value of his work until his presence is removed. Not till then can he know whether it amounts to stubble, or whether the proof of its sure foundation is furnished by daily evidence that his absence increases the friendship of his pupils, and that they practise the lessons taught by a voice now silent.

This is, I think, a fair sample of the manner and method of the book, and I wish to say at once that I have not a word against it; doubtless it will be useful in its place.

And yet I do not know. All these excellent and practical and pious explanations tend to remind me of the curate who, preaching on the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, found occasion in the mention of the fact that there was a lad present to draw the impressive lesson that we must not neglect to make use of our young people. Now I am sure that this is quite true, and I am also sure that I should have liked to hurl a hymn-book at the preacher's head. And one meets the same kind of comment on all sides; how much of literary criticism is mere literal criticism, pausing and delaying all the while on surfaces and externals, and on the obvious face of things, without ever seeking the secrets of the deep and hidden places that are beneath! People say, "Oh! that mystical way of talking is all very well, but men don't understand it; they want something practical that they can take in—good, homely truths."

I don't believe a word of all this. On the contrary, it seems clear that all the great moving forces come from the deeps, from those regions which are really "at the back of things," which are truly mystical and transcendent. If human life is anything else than an atrociously managed beehive or ant-hill, afflicted with every monstrous disorder and anguish and evil that an archdemon could desire for a wretched swarm of irresponsible insects, then its explanation is not to be sought in little amiable moralities and pious exhortations to be good; and we shall only be delivered from our afflictions by sayings and doings that are altogether irrational, paradoxical, and magical: the wild songs of fairy-land, sung to unearthly tones, are the only medicine for the heartache and the headache of humanity. I have forgotten many sermons, I am glad to say, but I shall never forget a sentence that I once saw written on the altar of a Roman Catholic church, "The Unseen is here and calleth to thee." The words are a great music—a true incantation—filling the soul and carrying it away from the world of the amiabilities and moralities into the regions of high immortal ecstasy and ravishment; that church became at once an enchanted citadel—an island of Paradise set secure in the midst of the dark seas of mortality. The light of its altar tapers was verily the light that never was on land or sea; its gates were as the glorious gates of the heavenly Zion.

Take this proverb, "Absence makes the heart grow fonder," commented on by Mr. Chapman. I say not a word against his talk about mothers' influence and schoolmasters' influence; but for me the interest of the proverb lies in this, that under the guise of a popular axiom it bears witness to the great paradox of asceticism. There are the two great contrasting figures in human history—the ancient ascetic and the modern millionaire. The former became happy, oddly enough, by getting rid of things; the latter, also oddly enough, makes himself acutely unhappy by getting hold of things. Sometimes the millionaire is highly æsthetic, and ransacks the whole world for beautiful objects, for books and pictures and carven work and embroideries that only millionaires can buy; and yet not for a moment does he truly possess any of these images of loveliness. He holds them materially in cabinets and strong boxes and steel safes; but they are to him fairy gold; they are rubbish and dead leaves to his weary, blinded eyes. A magpie or a raven may steal a gem of exquisite beauty and hide it in the ground; in such sort and in no other way does the rich man possess the treasures that he has bought.

And, on the other hand, the true ascetic is inebriated by the contemplation and veritable possession of eternal beauties and treasures. Within his soul he has the real things, of which the material objects of art galleries and museums and collections are but the wretched, dim, and ineffectual copies. He would not walk across the street to see a Turner, any more than the man in the stage beneath him, having a real Turner, would walk across the street to view an indifferent copy of it. The ascetic kept his eyes on the ground in passing through the beautiful scenery, not, as Ruskin supposed, out of a kind of religious churlishness and puritanical avoidance of anything pleasant, but because the heights that were before him in vision were more tremendous than any earthly peaks, and the immortal groves through which his spirit wandered exceeded far in majesty all the trees of the material wood. He bowed his eyes to the ground—lest the veritable picture should be blurred by the sight of the indifferent copy. It is by the absence of the latter that the heart grows fond of the former.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

* Duckworth. 5s. net.

TWENTY FAVOURITE BOOKS

BY FRANK HARRIS

A LITTLE while ago in London there was much talk of "the hundred best books," and this mandarin and that made out a list and frightened the semi-illiterate with a vast pretence of knowledge. That there is something interesting in the idea, however, is attested by the fact that a French newspaper has taken the matter up and called on some eminent men of letters to give the list of their "Twenty Favourite Books."

When I read this I was mildly excited. Now, I thought to myself, we shall see who appear to be the great men when viewed from the meridian of Paris. But to my disappointment nine lists out of ten were merely pretentious; they had nothing personal in them; they were purely conventional, and as untrue as if one said that one's favourite painters were Titian, Raphael, and Corregio, or one's favourite musicians Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart.

One man, however, has broken through the convention. The list given by Jules Lemaître, the famous Academician, has something in it of individual taste and personal preference. Here is his list:—(1) "La Bible," (2) Homère, (3) Eschyle, (4) Virgile, (5) Tacite, (6) L'Imitation de Jésus-Christ, (7) Un Volume de Shakespeare, (8) Don Quichotte, (9) Rabelais, (10) Montaigne, (11) Un Volume de Molière, (12) Un Volume de Racine, (13) Les Pensées de Pascal, (14) L'Ethique de Spinosa, (15) Les Contes de Voltaire, (16) Un Volume de Poésie de Lamartine, (17) Un Volume de Poésie de Victor Hugo, (18) Le Théâtre d'Alfred de Musset, (19) Un Volume de Michelet, (20) Un Volume de Renan.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Now even this list is affected and pretentious. Is there any man of letters who could really put Homer among his twenty favourite volumes? Of course most of us have read Homer in our youth, or at least a dozen books of the Iliad and half a dozen of the Odyssey. But does any modern who has made a name for himself in letters look into Homer once a year? Surely not. Our life is too complex and too interesting to linger over such childish stories. And the same objection applies still more strongly to Æschylus and to Virgil. But take away the first eight or ten books on the list, and the others strike me as sincere—they represent a real choice, and, curiously enough, they are all French books. Not one foreign author is included among Jules Lemaître's favourites. The world of thought for him, the world of poetry and aspiration, is all French; his spiritual kingdom has French frontier lines, and little French douaniers protect him from foreign importations.

But hardly had Lemaître made out his list when he saw that it was insincere—conventional and not personal. He therefore wrote withdrawing the first ten numbers. "Is it true," he asked himself, "that I often feel a desire to read the Bible and Æschylus?" The question answered itself. He shrugged his shoulders, and substituted the books which he really does read, and "which have furnished forth his intellectual and moral being." He begins the second list with Sante-Beuve and Taine, "Adolphe," the "Dominique" of Fromentin, the "Pensées" of Marcus Aurelius, a little Kant, a little Schopenhauer, a volume of Sully Prudhomme, "Les Fleurs du Mal," a novel of Balzac, two of Flaubert, one of Zola, one of Daudet, some tales of Maupassant, and a volume of Loti; some comedies of Marivaux and Meilhac, and the "Silvestre Bonnard" of Anatole France.

Now, suddenly realising that he has made out a list of eighteen or twenty new books instead of ten, he throws away the whole of the first list except Racine and Renan. And thus we get to his real mind. It is even more French than I had at first imagined. There is still a little tincture of German philosophy, a reminiscence of Homer and Virgil, a pathetic cadence of Heine, a sonorous echo of Æschylus, a biting phrase of Tacitus, but that is all which this cultivated French writer of to-day cares to import from abroad.

This list of Lemaître is calculated to cause an Englishman some patriotic searching of heart: have we then contributed nothing to the world's literature finer or more peculiar than Kant or Schopenhauer or Marcus Aurelius? Surely, we reply—surely Lemaître does not know Shakespeare or Emerson, Bacon or Browning. For the best of these is finer than the best of Schopenhauer and Marcus Aurelius, finer at once and more peculiar, more necessary therefore to be known by a talented Frenchman.

Just to draw lines of exact relation I too have made a list which has, I think, the merit of sincerity. A short time ago I made a selection of books to take abroad with me, and I chose the books set forth here together with a few books of reference—an Encyclopædia and some dictionaries. Here is my list:—(1) The Bible, (2) Shakespeare, (3) Emerson, (4) Goethe, (5) Balzac, (6) Heine, (7) Dante, (8) Montaigne, (9) Cervantes, (10) Book of English Lyrics, (11) Book of French Lyrics, (12) Schopenhauer, (13) Charles Reade, (14) Flaubert (especially the letters), (15) Turgenieff, (16) Dostoievsky, (17) Browning, (18) Volume including the "Pensées" of Pascal, Vauvenargues, and Joubert, (19) Volume including the "Rubaiyat" and Bacon's Essays, (20) Volume including "Lorna Doone," "A Gentleman of France," "Sister Carrie."

The first thing to be remarked about this list is that it is almost as modern as the list of M. Lemaître. I do read the Bible, but I do not read Homer, or Æschylus, or Virgil. I do not open them or even think of them once in a blue moon. I no longer read Plato or Tacitus, whom I once read with unfeigned delight. I would not say that the years spent on learning Greek or Latin were wholly lost: I do say that no Greek or Latin writer means much to my maturity. The time spent on the classics would have been better spent on Russian or Japanese.

The next peculiarity of my list is that five French books figure in it as against three German books; and this proportion represents fairly, I think, the relative importance of French and German literatures.

Moreover, the five French books and the three German books are set against eight English books, and though there was no such intention on my part when I made the choice, it really seems to me that this proportion is a fairly true estimate of the relative values of these literatures to a citizen of the world. English literature, it seems to me, is nearly as rich as French and German literatures put together. though in this I am probably over-estimating English literature, for the German Bible of Luther is at least as fine as the English Bible.

It may be remarked further that there are only five modern English books as against four modern French books, and I am afraid this shows some English prejudice; for the novels of France in the last fifty years are ten times as valuable as our English novels, thanks to the prudery which has emasculated English literature. And I am very doubtful indeed whether that citizen of the world I spoke of just now would not substitute Victor Hugo for Browning and assign Emerson to America, and thus put modern French literature far above modern English literature.

Another peculiarity of my list is that Charles Reade is given a place in it among the greatest above Defoe, Fielding, Thackeray, and Dickens. I cannot help it. I am persuaded that "The Cloister and the Hearth" is beyond comparison the best novel in English. It ranks in its own way with "The Crime and Punishment" of Dostoievsky, which, in my opinion, is more valuable than anything of Tolstoi. I cannot leave out Turgenieff, the creator of Bazaroff, the Nihilist; but I will admit that No. 20, which includes "Lorna Doone," represents merely personal taste.

I cannot pretend that "Lorna Doone" is better than "Vanity Fair" or "The Old Wives' Tales," or that "A Gentleman of France" is superior in any respect to a volume including the half-dozen best tales of Kipling. But I can and do read "Lorna Doone" and "A Gentleman of France" every now and then, and I do not re-read "Vanity Fair" or Kipling. "Sister Carrie" is in a slightly different category: it is an American novel, but it is published in the Dollar Library of Heinemann, and it is, I think, a better story than any of Hawthorne's—the best story, on the whole, which has yet come out of America, perhaps better than any realistic story which has yet been produced in England.

And now I perceive that I have not only put forth a list of my own, but explained and justified it; whereas if it were at all perfect it would need no commentary, but would be its own sufficient justification. My only excuse is that it is a better list than Lemaître's—more cosmopolitan, truer to greatness, and not so insular.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

STATE INSURANCE

WORKING-CLASS ANTI-SOCIALISTS

By Sir William Bull

Mr. Lloyd George's scheme of State Insurance is of especial interest in relation to the political ideas which have lately found increasing acceptance among a body of working-class voters. On the old lines of voluntary effort, the working-class had established great organisations for the grant of benefits in sickness, at death, and, to a less extent, in time of unemployment. Mr. Lloyd George has made no attempt to institute State "funeral benefits"; but, in the case of the other benevolent undertakings, he is founding a compulsory system of public assistance with which the voluntary associations are to be incorporated. The consequence is that great numbers of men who have hitherto made no provision for probable misfortune are put, roughly, on a level with those who have practised thrift and shown prudence, and the latter class has to bear its share of the brunt of the resulting dislocation of the old organisation. This development brings home to wage-earners with ability for self-help the operation of the Socialist principle of levelling down; they themselves have to accept a system applicable to the mass, instead of reaping the full benefit of raising themselves above the mass-level; and by this means they have a slight foretaste of the Utopian conditions promised by Socialism. In the Socialist State all would be workers under communal control; the deficiencies of those whose utility failed to raise them to the common level would be made good by those whose energy, intelligence, and goodwill placed them naturally above the common level; and the vast cost of State administration of all industry would have to be paid in meal or in malt, in money or in kind, by the productive workers.

It is therefore an instructive lesson in politics to see how two sections of the working-class, those who have made provision for themselves within the limits of individualism and those who acclaim Socialism, have treated Mr. Lloyd George's mild exemplification of Socialist principles.

The Chancellor of the Fxchequer, in planning the amalgamation of State and voluntary insurance, followed a wise policy. He consulted the representatives of Friendly Societies, he conciliated them, and by contriving that those Societies should gain a large addition to their membership, he offered them an advantage which won their approval. But in doing this he modified the Socialist spirit in his scheme. The voluntary organisations were not prepared to accept the bad with the good, they were unwilling to regard themselves as social contributories to every man's benefit irrespective of his worth as an accession to their numbers; a special class of "Post-office contributors" had to be formed, and Mr. Lloyd George, in introducing his Insurance Bill in the House of Commons, referred to this class in the following terms: "Every inducement is offered to a man under this scheme to join a Society, and I will show how that works. We propose that all the men in a county who have not joined a Society should be collected together in a body called the Post-office contributors. You will form a fund of these people. Most of the men who remain outside will be uninsurable lives, men who would be rejected by all sorts of Societies because really they are ill at the time or display symptoms of illness. Or they may be drunkards. These are the sort of reasons for which a Society now excludes men. That must necessarily make it impossible for us to pay the same benefits to the Post-office contributors as would be paid to men who are in the Friendly Societies, because they include pretty well all the bad lives."

That is a very significant utterance. It shows that the business sense, the traditional reasonable self-regard of the wage-earners who had organised themselves for mutual benefit, prompted them to reject the burden of Socialism. The Friendly Societies were not disposed to accept, in recognition of a theoretical social solidarity, "all the bad lives," and there is no doubt that the officials of the Societies, in governing their course by that objection, had the approval of the vast majority of those whom they represented.

Even when this departure from Socialist principle had been definitely made, the great Benefit Societies made reservations in welcoming the Government's scheme. The President of the Southern Conference of the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows "sees in the Insurance Bill the outline of possible State interference which, if once allowed in any form, might mean the undoing of a century's work." The Chairman of the National Deposit Friendly Society admits that "personally he looks with regret on a system that is not voluntary," and "doubts whether the Bill will prove to be that panacea for sickness and poverty which Mr. Lloyd George has suggested." The Actuary of the Hearts of Oak and other important benefit associations says: "I do not know what view friendly societies will be disposed to take of the scheme. Some have been lukewarm in their appreciation of the Chancellor's enterprise, fearing that their liberty of action was about to diminish, and their concerns to be transferred more or less indirectly to the charge of the State." The Honorary Secretary of the Association of Industrial Assurance Companies and Collecting Friendly Societies, speaking on behalf of a large number of enterprises, states that "the members of the Association view with the utmost sympathy any actuarially sound scheme for helping working men and women to make provision for sickness, invalidity, and unemployment; but they urge that there must be no interference with the business or rights of existing institutions as by law established." The honorary secretary of a lodge of the Manchester Unity, writing to the Times on behalf of 60 per cent. of the members of his branch who had joined the society before they were twenty years of age, asked: "Is it fair that the thrifty should carry on their shoulders for the next twenty years those who for various reasons have not joined a friendly society?"

These are representative utterances, and they show that the more capable section of the working-class resolutely opposes the application of the Socialistic principle to enterprises which that section supports and controls. It is unlikely that the large body of shrewd wage-earners will change their attitude in this respect. Most Socialists are enthusiastic, and some are able, and as a body they miss no advantage which a well-sustained propaganda can offer to their cause; but they constantly fail to show that they are practical, and the tendency of each group of them to treat all proposals for social reform other than its own in the spirit of a fractious child unfits them for moving the judgment of a class which expects a patient appeal to experience as a condition of each advance towards improved social conditions. The reception given to the Government's Insurance Scheme by the Socialists exemplifies their habit of mind. They did not acknowledge with a tribute of gratitude the manifest signs in the Bill of the impression which Socialistic pretensions had made upon the Cabinet. They did not unite to support Mr. Lloyd George's proposal as a concession and an experiment in their favour. The Labour Leader, expressing the opinions of the Independent Labour Party and the more moderate Socialists, published a leading article on the scheme which praised it faintly as a whole and carped at it vigorously in detail. To make sure that too much value should not be accorded to the faint praise it gave prominence on the same date to a long article on the Ministerial plan by the Secretary of a Friendly Assurance Collecting Society, opening with the phrase, "The present Government will be known as the Government that betrayed the widows and orphans." In the same issue several leading Labour men in Parliament, including Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Philip Snowden and a quartet of prominent feminine Socialists, added their voices to the querulous chorus, and Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., was permitted to deal frankly—perhaps justly, but not at a suitable moment—with the limitations of Mr. Lloyd George as a statesman. "In this insurance scheme the strength and the weakness of Lloyd George are once more displayed to the observant eye. His strength lies in an unerring instinct which enables him to strike the popular imagination with proposals of secondary importance. His weakness lies in his neglect of fundamental and important propositions;" and, "Of the two forms of expenditure, assuredly expenditure for the prevention of sickness would commend itself as immeasurably more important to Mr. Lloyd George if his statesmanship were less showy and more substantial."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Justice, pronouncing the verdict of the Social Democratic Party, inveighed against the Bill with its customary bigotry; and in the Clarion, Mr. Victor Grayson, assuming the editor's first person plural, declared, "We cannot conceive how any intelligent Trade Unionist, much less any Socialist, can be imposed upon by so transparent a device."

It is impossible to satisfy the Socialists with items of their own programme. From their noisy circle nothing issues but complaints, peevish demands, and recriminations. The resourceful section of the working class may, upon consideration, acquiesce in the Government's scheme or may reject it. But they will not accept it under an attraction towards Socialism or in the Socialistic spirit.

MOB LAW

A REMINISCENCE OF FORTY YEARS AGO

By an Eye-Witness

One bright day in May, forty years ago, I stood on the Bridge of Concord and beheld Paris burning, whilst Frenchmen with deadly purpose were springing at each other's throats, and the gutters on either side of the fair river Seine were flowing with their blood. As night came on the sky grew lurid with the reflection from countless conflagrations. Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité had vanished, and Væ Victis was the motto of the hour. This was when France lay panting from a myriad wounds, crushed beneath the heel of a proud, victorious invader, who but a few weeks before I had seen march triumphantly down the Champs Elysées singing "Die Wacht am Rhein." But what had la canaille cared for that? It had seen its opportunity, had risen, gained the upper hand, and seized upon the once so-called Capital of Civilisation. Then for ten long weeks of rapine—from March 18th to May 28th, 1871—Paris, to the horror of every law-abiding citizen throughout the civilised world, had been left a prey to Mob Law.

The trouble had ostensibly arisen over some cannon which, in accordance with the articles of the capitulation, were to be delivered up to the Germans. In reality, however, the Red Republican leaders, backed up by a band of needy, rapacious aliens, had resolved on making a bid for power. As they were predominant on the self-styled Central Committee of the National Guard, they accordingly availed themselves of this opportunity, and refused to hand over the guns in possession of those troops. The reason they gave was that the convention ought not to apply to any cannon cast during the siege from the proceeds of public subscriptions, and this preposterous contention found numerous adherents. Becoming bolder, the Reds even laid hands on many other guns scattered about the city, over a hundred in number, some having been removed from the fortifications, and they placed strong guards over them.

This state of affairs continued until the 18th of March, when an attempt was made to assert the Government's authority. In the small hours of the morning a detachment of Regular troops was assembled under two Generals and sent to seize the ordnance parked on the heights of Montmartre, one of the hotbeds of the insurrectionary movement. The representatives of law and order at first met with success, but the horses and traces required for the removal of the guns failed to arrive to time owing to some blunder, with the result that during the wait the Regulars, who were for the most part raw levies, became demoralised. When the moment for further action arose they refused to obey their officers, but instead fraternised with the rabid citizen-soldiers who by this time had gathered in their thousands in response to the call of the rappel. The latter, accompanied by an angry crowd of vituperative viragoes and yelling children, practically surrounded the Government troops. At the word of command the Regulars, instead of fixing bayonets as ordered, raised the butt-ends of their rifles in the air and joined the insurrectionaries.

The armed, frenzied mob of Regulars and irregulars—for by now they had become nothing less—cast all discipline to the four winds, and with dire threats rushed upon the two generals and other officers. General Paturel's horse threw him during the mêlée, nevertheless he managed to escape with his staff. The other, General Lecomte, was less fortunate. He was dragged from his horse, made prisoner, and hurried to a small two-storeyed building in the Rue des Rosiers, where the Central Committee of the National Guard usually met. This cottage had once been the home of Scribe, the playwright. It was proposed to try General Lecomte by court-martial, and whilst the question was under discussion another important capture was made in the person of General Clément Thomas, an old, white-bearded veteran, who had commanded the National Guard during some part of the siege. The General had made himself very unpopular among the Red Republicans by disbanding some free corps for cowardice in face of the enemy. He was dressed in civilian attire watching what was going on, when, unfortunately for him, he was recognised, and seized on the pretext of being a spy; he was then haled off to join General Lecomte.

Before the Central Committee had come to a decision with reference to the two generals the military rabble outside, grown impatient, burst into the house and seized first Thomas and then Lecomte. They dragged them along a passage leading to the garden, and thrust Thomas against a wall on which grew a peach-tree. Holding his hat in his hand, he faced the mob proudly, and it was not until the seventeenth shot that he fell, so wretched had been the aim of his assassins. Lecomte struggled to escape, and was shot in the back before he reached the wall. The two bodies, after lying for some hours in the garden, were removed to an empty room of the house and laid on the floor. A sheet was placed over them, but the faces of the murdered men were left uncovered, and at night a candle was stood beside them in order that they might still be seen. During the three days they remained there unburied scores of women and children came to gaze through the open window on the victims of "popular justice"—otherwise Mob Law, as enacted on that Spring morning in the Street of the Rose Trees. This was the first act of the ten weeks' tragedy I was destined to witness.

Victorious at Montmartre, the revolutionaries descended on central Paris, raising barricades at various points on their way. Panic-stricken, the pusillanimous Government resolved to retire to Versailles. M. Thiers, the chief, left the city at 3 p.m.; General Valentin, Prefect of Police, retired at 7 p.m.; Jules Ferry, Prefect of the Seine, however, remained at his post until 9.55 p.m. They were followed by General Vinoy with what remained of the Regular troops, some forty thousand in number, and thus Paris was left to the mercy of the Mob. The Commune, consisting of seventy-five members, was soon formed. They were a motley crew—a few men of some talent but little principle, old men embittered against society in general, young ones eager for power and position, a whole tribe of authors and journalists, the famous painter Courbet, and a certain Allix, a lunatic, the inventor of "sympathetic snails" as a means of telegraphic communication. They quickly proceeded to pass many outrageous and often insensate measures which they forthwith put into execution.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

All independent newspapers were suppressed, churches were turned into public clubs where demagogues perorated from the pulpits, while barricades sprang up on all sides. On the 5th of April came the atrocious decree concerning the hostages, followed by the arrest of the Archbishop of Paris, of the Curé of the Madeleine, of President Bonjean, and of more than six hundred priests, gendarmes, ex-Government officials, &c. On the 7th of April it was decreed that every citizen between the ages of nineteen and forty should be forcibly enrolled in the battalions in the fighting-line. On the 12th of April the demolition of the Colonne Vendôme was ordered, and this was carried out on the 16th of May, when the famous bronze record of the mighty deeds of the Grande Armée and the effigy of the Petit Corporal in Roman costume surmounting it were laid low on a gigantic manure-heap in the Street of Peace. The painter Courbet was mainly responsible for this act of vandalism. Crowds had been waiting for days to see the column fall, and I arrived on the spot just in the nick of time. On the 10th of May the destruction of Thiers' house and the confiscation of his portable property was decreed, and duly carried out; while several other private residences were broken into, searched, and pillaged. Indeed, many of the Communards stole whatever they could lay their hands upon and led riotous lives with the proceeds, arraying themselves in official uniforms and indulging in orgies in the palaces and Government buildings.

Nemesis, however, was at hand. On the evening of Sunday, the 21st of May, a few companies of the Versailles troops succeeded in entering Paris, and then what is known as the "Bloody Week" began, for by three o'clock on the following morning the bulk of the Government forces had poured into the capital, determined to put an end to Mob Law. The street-fighting lasted a full week, each day of which was marked with bloodshed and fire. The Versaillese were able to carry by outflanking movements all the barricades the insurgents had raised for their defence. Most of the latter who were captured were shot on the spot, together with several women charged with incendiarism. The man who had marks of gunpowder on his hands, the woman who was suspected of being a pétroleuse, I saw on many an occasion placed in a row and executed militarily without any form of trial. As the Communards retired from one position to another they set fire to both public buildings and private residences, after having drenched them with petroleum. Then, with yells of fiendish triumph, they retreated further afield to continue their dastardly work. On May 23rd the Tuilleries, the Palace of the Legion of Honour, and the Court of Accounts were blazing. On the 24th the Ministry of Finances, the Palais-Royal, and the Hôtel de Ville met with the same fate; and on the 25th the Villette magazines, the great storehouse known as the Grenièr d'Abondance, the Palace of Justice, two theatres, several district town-halls, and many private houses followed suit.

By this time more than half of Paris had been recaptured by the Government troops, but the insurgent rabble still fought on. Those gathered at Belleville and in the Père Lachaise Cemetery employed their remaining guns to fire on Paris indiscriminately. A shell carried away the upper corner of the house in which I was living near the Elysée. Meantime, other insurgents were busy putting to death a large number of the hostages they had been detaining since the beginning of April, the venerable Archbishop of Paris being the first to suffer. The crime was atrocious, the reprisals were terrible. When the Versaillese reached the prison of La Roquette, where the hostages had been massacred, 277 insurgents captured at various points were shot down in a heap, and when Père Lachaise Cemetery, which had been formed into a redoubt, was carried, 148 others were placed against a wall and likewise despatched, while there were numerous other summary executions. Corpses with ugly gaping wounds, on which the flies feasted in the hot May sun, lay unburied about the streets for days. I saw scores of them heaped one on the other lying against the parapet of the quays in the direction of the Bastille, where fighting was still going on. Cannon thundered on all sides, and bullets whizzed through the air.

Every non-combatant who ventured about the streets at that time carried his life in his hand, risking at any moment to be sniped by either Communard or Versaillais. Nevertheless, eager to see all I could, I many a time ran across the line of fire, ducking while the chassepot bullets whistled over my head. On May 28th the fighting came to an end, and the principal buildings of Paris were in ashes. It was a terrible catastrophe, which cost France thousands of lives and millions of money. And all because a weak Government allowed the Mob to get the upper hand.

THE ASCETIC ENTRAPPED

However much he was tripped into a headlong fall of error, however much his thwarted nature overcame him, driving him into deceit, craft, and cunning, it cannot be said of Angelo that he was of the tribe of hypocrites.

His was not the very demeanour of the hypocrite. He wore no cloak of sanctity to ensnare and entrap the guileless. If his visage was sour, the deeps of his soul were sour also. He was, or sought earnestly to be, of a piece throughout. Nor was he altogether as his distant cousin Malvolio. Like him, he was an egoist; yet since the best and the worst in this world is egoism, to say so much is not to advance the matter. But while Malvolio was an egoist whose soul mantled in a fatuous self-complacence, Angelo was an egoist who burned in contempt of the richness of the earth. He sought to delude none thereby; for what mattered it to delude frail men who were but brands for the divine flame to burn, wither, deracinate, and destroy utterly? If he held a sword of hatred against the richness of the earth, he held it naked and unashamed; he did not hide it beneath his cloak, and smile and smile and be a villain. It was the Duke who said of him:—

> Angelo,
> There is a kind of character in thy life,
> That to th' observer doth thy history
> Fully unfold.

Whether or no the somewhat egregious Duke meant to draw out the would-be ascetic, and show him to be compact of the one common clay of humanity by devolving the responsibility of office on him, such an utterance as this is at least a tribute to the fact that self-deluded he might be, but no hypocrite was he. And when Angelo replies: "Let there be some test made of my metal, before so noble and so great a figure be stamped upon't," this is the voice of a man who seeks thwarting and castigation that he thus might be purged of weakness. A hypocrite might have mouthed some self-depreciation, but would not have "evaded" the commission.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

No! he was no hypocrite. A hypocrite is of simple tissue, whereas Angelo was complexity itself. A hypocrite would have connived for greater power or riches, for it is the pursuit of a purpose that creates hypocrisy; whereas the Duke explicitly says of him that he "stands at a guard with envy." Moreover he is "precise," a "man of stricture and firm abstinence;" and these are not the qualities of hypocrisy; they lack the savour of unction that is the inevitable concomitant of hypocrisy. But they are the firm indications of something far more deeply interesting in the annals of the humankind. They point the ascetic with a very positive digit. They mark out with unfailing accuracy the man who seeks to crush out all the rich juices from his flesh; the man who strives for a dominance in which the will shall be supreme; and who regards all the desires and loves of this world as snares about his feet. He is, like Malvolio, a censorious Puritan; but while Malvolio is the Puritan smug and sleek, he is hungry, gaunt-cheeked, and eager-eyed.

What shall snare such a man? What shall trip him by the heels? Malvolio needed but to be laughed at; but he, what can be done to him, seeing that laughter cannot touch him? Malvolio needed but to be shown himself; but Angelo is always seeing himself, though it is with a churlish eye he does so. Malvolio is self-satisfied; Angelo is self-dissatisfied; he curbs and whips his nature until it can be said of him that he is

> A man whose blood
> Is very snow-broth; one who never feels
> The wanton stings and motions of the sense,
> But doth rebate and blunt his natural edge
> With profits of his mind, study, and fast.

That is to say, all those natural courses that alone exposure could fasten on he denies himself; until it would seem that he must needs go down to his grave with an unbroken will. For if he should fall, as he does not deny to Escalus that he may in the past have fallen, this not only makes his self-censure harsher, but drives him out in vengeance on all others who might happen to fall in a similar manner. He serves the god Principle, and stands to its service against all, including himself.

Yet Nature cannot be denied. If he will stopper all the natural vents of his appetite, then his appetite will seek vents that are hideous and unnatural. If he denies the sweet processes of Nature, processes must be aroused in him that shall shame the sun, even as a man's blood, if it may not sweat, will break out into irruptions. So he is to find it. He has forsworn women; and has just renewed the force of an ancient slumbering law whereby all the frailty of men with women shall procure the utmost penalty of the law. The very completeness of his hatred of such frailty makes us fear for him, so unhealthy is it. It does not matter to him if the intimacy be even subsequent to a contract, as was the case with Claudio and Julietta. Her he speaks coldly and contemptuously of, as a fornicatress, for which the barest sufficiencies of life must suffice; him he condemns impartially to death. The child of the union, too, would probably be hideous and revolting in his tainted, unnatural eye.

To such a man ordinary women are no temptation. Or, from another point of view, with such a man ordinary women would not mean a sufficiently monstrous sin to glut his curbed desire. His asceticism had given his appetite a diabolical refinement. His nature is perverted; for even as satiety requires to invent new and fiendish sins, so asceticism requires the delicatest morsels to conquer and satisfy it.

It might well have happened that his whole life might have run its course, and no such refined sin have tempted his appetite. But it did not so happen. Claudio's sister came before him to sue for her brother's life; and of her even the mocking Lucio could say:

> I hold you as a thing ensky'd and sainted;
> By your renouncement, an immortal spirit;
> And to be talked with in sincerity,
> As with a saint.

She was cold, even as he; and pure, as he was not; and beautiful. Moreover, wisdom spoke on her tongue with apt metaphor and rich eloquence. No ordinary soul was she as she stood before him and pleaded her brother's cause. Her eloquence overpowered him; and she captured his moral argument, for he felt that she condemned her brother's sin with a severity not second to his own. And had she not laid by the cloistral veil to come before him with this plea? Already she appealed to his refined desires. But when she stood before him, cloistral and beautiful, and, pointing at him, bade him:

> Go to your bosom;
> Knock there, and ask your heart what it doth know
> That's like my brother's fault; if it confess
> A natural guiltiness such as his is.

What could be done then? His thwarted nature rose to it. She aroused a desire in him that would not be denied.

Quickly his will swept to his throat, and grappled with it. But it was useless; for now that his appetite had burst its shackles it would not, could not, be denied. "When I would pray and think," says he, tempest-tossed, "I think and pray to several subjects. Heaven hath my empty words; whilst my intention, hearing not my tongue, anchors on Isabel." Only one thought fills his mind, and that thought is Isabel. He had thought to beat Nature; to bind it in the icy bonds and restraints of asceticism; but the terrible confession is wrung from him, "Blood, thou art still blood." And that blood roared through him like a tide that all too long had been dammed up.

The rest is the ascetic swept away and engulfed by the flood he had sought to deny, to stem, ruthlessly to curb. His tale is over; for the rest is not the account of an ascetic, but of a man whose sharpened appetite, having been awakened to fury by the thought of cloistered purity, finds its vent in a fury of desire. Even as he was no hypocrite before, so he refrains from the attempt to deceive himself now. The mind that before had put out its utmost power of will to crush his flesh, to stand independent of it in frigid self-possession, now puts out no less an intensity of purpose to satisfy the imperative demand of a refined appetite. He sought to deny the sweetness of Nature, and Nature became unsweet. He obstructed its goodness and charm, and it became hungry and evil. There needed but the sufficient sin: it was proffered, and as he is swept away we hear his despairing cry, "Blood, thou art still blood." To him who denied it, it was indeed a despairing cry, for it meant hopelessness; but to them that know Nature for what she is, and use her sweetly and wisely, his cry is the voice of sanity and hope.

MUSIC

LEGENDS die hard, and there is one which, as it seems, will never die. This is the legend, held by foreign musicians to be sober truth, that London concert-rooms are paved with gold. Year after year the sweet-throated and the deft-fingered strangers come in their flocks, trusting to bewitch Londoners with their music-spell. They must, one supposes, have met in their own lands with artists who, having made their London pilgrimage, had returned sadder, wiser, and poorer, their only reward a few lines penned by the luckless reporter of some daily newspaper who has had to "look in at" twenty or thirty musical performances in a week. But still they cherish a touching hope that they will prove exceptions to what appears to be the rule. "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh me." Thus they comfort themselves in advance. They engage their room, they give their concert, and then the place knoweth them no more, and the memory of them is blotted out. London is full of simple folk who like music and have leisure, so that the concert-agents have no difficulty in providing a respectable audience for most of these strangers by the gift of tickets. And so it comes to pass that numbers of people who, under other circumstances, would not infrequently treat themselves to a concert, decline to pay for a seat, hoping to get one for nothing. A consequence of this state of things is that artistes of name and fame suffer, and programmes of the highest interest are performed by them to audiences of the non-paying class. We are told that similar conditions, only much aggravated, prevail in Berlin, but that cannot bring lively consolation to the impoverished artists.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

If any one could find a remedy for it all, and check the output of concerts, he would deserve well of the musical profession, and of the amateur as well. Seeing that we are offered far too many concerts in London, especially at this time of year, it is not surprising that even the best should not attract an audience worthy of them. But it is rather humiliating, when one thinks of the population of London and the number of musical people in it, to see such a conductor as Nikisch, let us say, directing before anything less than an overflowing house such orchestras as the London Symphony and the Philharmonic. When Nikisch paid his first visits to London it was sometimes difficult, even for those who pay, to obtain a seat at his concerts. He is a maturer musician now, and Schubert's C Major Symphony is not less beautiful than it was. Why, then, was not Queen's Hall filled to its last seat at the Philharmonic Concert when this great conductor was to play that great work? We do not believe it was because the man or the music have lost the love of the musical public. The reason is simply that we are overdone with concerts. It is a great pity, for there must have been many who would have sacrificed much to have heard Nikisch conduct the C Major, but who had already heard as much music during the last week or two as they could manage, and needed a rest. They missed what was probably as fine a performance of the symphony that Queen's Hall has heard. As regards its Andante, certainly the present writer thinks he has never heard so perfectly finished a performance, not even from Richter. One used to expect exciting, even startling, "readings" from Nikisch, and stimulating and interesting as these often were, one felt that in the long run Richter would prove the best conductor to live with. But in Schubert's symphony the other day Nikisch was as "legitimate" as the most old-fashioned amateur could have desired. He allowed the music to tell its own story, only he saw to it that the story was told with the most perfect elocution and the finest sentiment. Only in the last movement could any ground for criticism be found. In it he was possibly too correct in his propriety.

After this memorable performance we listened to Miss Katharine Goodson—a pianist of whom the English school may well be proud—playing the vivacious concerto of her husband, Mr. Hinton, and also to an excerpt from Mr. Dale's suite for viola and orchestra. The viola is an instrument which, when it plays solos, the English public has not yet learned to love. Another concerto played recently at a concert directed by Nikisch (that of the Symphony Orchestra) was the early work of Paderewski. Mr. Schelling played the pianoforte part very brilliantly. It contains much fresh and charming music, and is obviously the work of a composer who would in the future have deeper, more important things to say. It is not the least merit of this concerto that its language is so unaffected; but who would expect anything not transparently sincere and natural from M. Paderewski? It was pleasant to hear at this concert, under such a master as Nikisch, the "Queen Mab" of Mr. Holbrooke, which, since we heard it on its production at a Leeds Festival, we have considered to be the composer's best work. There is a decline of inspiration, surely, in the Marcia, but the rest is most fascinating fairy-music, and the scoring is delightful.

Among the many chamber concerts, that given by M. Rivarde and Mr. Bauer stands out prominently. M. Rivarde is one of those consummate violinists who play in public too seldom. He is one of the aristocrats in the violinistic world, and perhaps it is the fastidiousness which makes him so singularly delightful an interpreter that keeps him so much away from concert platforms. The programme offered by these fine musicians was a model of such things; Brahms' Sonata in D Minor, Bach's Chaconne, Schumann's Fantasia in C, and César Franck's Sonata—four masterpieces, four cantos of contrasted feeling in four different tongues, four instances of the truth that Music is the most completely expressive of the Arts.

Of the Vocal Recitals, one by Mme. Jomelli deserves notice. She has an unusually splendid voice and the easy manner of a finely-cultured singer, though on the occasion of her concert she did not appear to have her undoubted powers quite under her control. M. Van Dyck as a concert singer would hardly convince the younger generation that his reputation in opera had not been exaggerated, and the discretion which prompted him to sing some of the big things from the "Rheingold," "Siegfried," and "Walküre" to a piano accompaniment in a small room like Bechstein Hall cannot be commended. To those who remembered the fine intelligence, the fiery enthusiasm, of this eminent artist in the days when his voice was equal to the demands he made upon it this recital can hardly have been a cheerful occasion.

The Opera at Covent Garden, with Melba, Tetrazzini, and Destinn as protagonists, draws enthusiastic multitudes. Mlle. Destinn is really very good as Aïda, and M. Gilly was successful as Amonasso. He has a very fine voice—either it is that "Aïda" is become an absolutely popular opera, or else it is that present-day opera-goers are more easily pleased than their predecessors of ten years ago; but it is a fact that the creditable, but not more than creditable, performance of "Aïda" last week was awarded much more enthusiastic applause than that which this opera used to receive when it was sung by what we should now consider an almost incredibly "star" cast. Mme. Eames and Tamagno, and Scotti and Plancon and Journet, and then Caruso and Sammarco. Mme. Kirkby Lunn has always been a superb Amneris, but this year she does not seem so well able as formerly to vary the colour of her voice.

THE SWEET O' THE YEAR

Is the average modern Briton softer or more of a grumbler than were his forbears, when men aboundingly felt the cheering power of Spring? To the Elizabethan Winter was the season of discontent, but with the lengthening of the days came a sense of stir and tumult, such as that which may be presumed to attune the blood of bird and beast and fill our copses and valleys with a growing chorus. The Elizabethan called the sprightliest of tunes for country dances, that to which youths and maidens were wont to foot it most featly, "a spring," from the old French word espringier—to dance. Thus, in that strange medley by

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

David Lindsay entitled "Lindsay's Complaint," wherein the poet tried to recall his royal young master to the claims of kingship, we read :—

> Upon the lute
> Then playt I twenty springis perqueir [by heart]
> Which was great pieté for to hear.

In Allan Ramsay's eclogue of "Patie and Roger" the shepherd Roger, describing the harshness of his mistress, tells how she beat his favourite hound "till he youl'd sair." His efforts to attune her temper to his own proved fruitless :—

> Last time I play'd, ye never saw sic spite,
> O'er Bogie was the spring and her delyte,
> Yet tauntingly she at her nibour speer'd
> Gin she cou'd tell what tune I play'd, and sneer'd
> Flocks wander where ye like, I dinna care;
> Ill break my reed and never whistle mair.

An anthology could be compiled illustrating the bland fullness of delight, the abounding sense of renewed vitality, which are inseparable from the English Spring poems of 250 to 350 years ago. Herrick's "Corinna's Maying" strikes the keynote of them all:—

> Get up, sweet Slug-a-bed, and see
> The dew bespangling herb and tree.

The whole poem speaks of a riotous exuberance of life. It must not be forgotten that our season nowadays is ten days earlier than was the case in the period above named. The Ides of March were apt to be a surly season three hundred years ago, even as they are to-day, and yet Perdita's craving for the young year's blossoming is recorded in lines that never grow stale or lose their perennial glory :—

> O, Prosperpina,
> For the flowers now, that, fright'd, thou lett'st fall
> From Dis's waggon! daffodils,
> That come before the swallow dares, and take
> The winds of March with beauty.

The daffodil and the primrose and

> The coy anemone that ne'er uncloses
> Her leaves until they're blown on by the wind have a literature of their own. The beauty of Wordsworth's vision of dancing daffodils, revealed to him by the poetic instinct of his sister, are a treasured possession.

Many of our early Spring flowers are poisonous, doubtless a form of protection against marauding cattle and nibbling flocks hunting for succulent herbage after the long fast of Winter. The fresh shoots of the common nettle, cooked in the same fashion, are every whit as good as spinach. The fact that the nettle may be gathered by every roadside and in every ditch is doubtless the reason why English folk make no use of it. Where the French peasant would thrive the Englishman will starve.

Our country lads gather sprays of the willow, studded with their fresh catkin blossoms, for "palm." No one who has ever attended a service in the tropics on Palm Sunday, in which branches of veritable palm are carried in procession, can forget the scene. Probably this association of the willow in our churches may account for the tree being an emblem of woe. Desdemona's song, "Sing willow, willow, willow," has its echo in many another doleful ditty of unrequited love. At that day to present a lover with a garland of willow was somewhat equivalent in modern parlance to giving him a rope with which to hang himself. Amongst the trees whose foliage is most conspicuous in early Spring is the aspen (Populus tremula). Aspen-leaves, said old writers, were women's tongues—they never ceased wagging.

When March gives place to April, and the first note of the cuckoo rings across the rathe foliage of our woodland ways, we all know that the riot of Spring is fast upon us.

> Every leaf in every nook,
> Every wave in every brook tells the story of the ripening year. The lark hangs poised in the heavens and peurs forth an ecstatic flood of sound which affects us strangely. The late Mr. Haweis used to argue that there was no real music in his note, that the street corner-man, with his pipe and a glass of water, can imitate the lark's "strains of unpremeditated art" with absolute fidelity. To the rambler by meadow and stream, with the sweet of the year filling his eyes and ears with delight, such views are sacrilege. Mr. Warde Fowler has proved conclusively that the bird's vocal apparatus is a veritable musical instrument, and that the sound by it produced is thus a true musical sound. A raven croaks and a nightingale warbles because one bird is an artist and the other has not acquired the art of producing a concord of sweet sounds. The whole subject is a fascinating one, and mainly because its solution depends so largely on the temperament of the individual listening, rather than on the strict scientific canons of the art of music. Beethoven in his Pastoral Symphony introduces echoes of the songs of birds. If by selection and training a bird choir could be evolved, the music of the symphony would be justified, but it is in the failure to combine that bird songs fall short of our standard of music. "God's choristers" can never be brought to rule and method. A wild, irrepressible outburst of individual melody is the true charm of woodland and covert. The human voice can imitate bird voices with much exactness. Let some musician write a concerted number which shall blend the notes of our song-birds; then let him set a choir of half a dozen human imitators to sing his work. Would the result be true music in the scientific sense of the word?

Darwin's theory of sexual selection as the origin of bird song is perhaps too extreme a statement. Wallace's view is that in the singing season the male bird is letting off the steam of his superabundant Spring energy and that natural selection has intensified his vocal powers by inheritance. The starling, like the parrot, can be trained to imitate. Would it ever be possible by generations of hereditary training to modify the notes of wild birds? If those notes are acquired, provided the conditions and environment were capable of attainment, it does not appear as if this should be an impossible task. After all, it is the irresponsibility of the song of wild birds which is their charm for us. We feel that the songster is no mere copyist, that the delicious flutage of the nightingale, the ripe melody of the thrush, and the chorus of blended notes which rise in coppice and shaw, and by the meadow banks of whispering streams is a chord inspired at the source and fountain of all harmony. Each Springtide is thus a miracle and a revelation. The flush of green deepening over hill and valley, the sense of newness, as of life revisiting the earth, are at once the embodiment, the symbol and the sign of an everlasting awakening of men's powers and passions from the Winter of forgetfulness.

THE CORONATION EXHIBITION

NEVER has the Londoner been catered for so well and bountifully in the matter of exhibitions as in this year of the Coronation. A week after the "Festival of Empire" opened its splendours to public view at the Crystal Palace the renewed and ever-welcome "White City" became its familiar summery self—though not altogether familiar. There are attractions beyond its shining portals quite strange, and quite as fascinating as those which called the crowd to gaze in previous years; and although the Empire which is especially before us this season is well represented by typical industries and exhibits from the four corners of the earth, the whole scheme does not clash in the slightest with the festival in progress at Sydenham.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Visitors thronged the grounds on the opening day, but only a select few were permitted to pass the red rope barriers to be present at the actual ceremony. Shortly after four o'clock the Exhibition was declared formally open by Prince Arthur of Connaught, and a salute of reverberating bombs signalled to all concerned that the business of delight might begin. The visitors were not slow to take advantage of this permission, and on all sides expressions of pleasure were to be heard. It was pleasant to note that the Japanese Garden has been allowed to remain—it shone underneath a somewhat grey sky as a blaze of blossom; the flower-beds also, in various parts of the grounds, were a mass of fragrant bloom. Various special features will be noticed this year, such as the boat in which Oxford won the April race, and an interesting display showing the evolution of the modern newspaper from the smallest beginnings. Here the student of literary and artistic matters will find plenty of items to interest him; the famous "Round Table" of Punch, with its classic monograms and initials, has a railed space for itself, and the cartoons which line the walls are a history in themselves of our social progress. A part which is easily missed, but is well worth inspection, is the lengthy corridor, or series of corridors, leading to the Uxbridge-road entrance. This awkwardly shaped space has been cleverly utilised. Through the sections devoted to science and scientific instruments regions of an entirely different character are reached; a realistic representation of a coal-mine, clever panoramic views of the British Isles, rendered extremely effective by a judicious admixture of the real with the pictorial, and many other temptations, succeed in delaying the saunterer's footsteps.

After all, perhaps the best of this Exhibition is to be found out of doors at evening, when the bands, and the fragrance, and the shimmer of the reflections from a hundred thousand lights all combine to impart an air of Continental gaiety to prosaic Shepherd's-bush. Given the fine summer which weather prophets seem to anticipate, the new "Coronation Exhibition" at the White City should be an unqualified success.

THE THEATRE

"JULIUS CÆSAR" AT HIS MAJESTY'S

"JULIUS CÆSAR" lends itself to stage production almost better than any of Shakespeare's tragedies. It has always been a favourite with the public since it was first produced before Charles II. in 1663, and it is equally a favourite with the actor, who loves its grand passages, full of music, rhythm, and noble feelings, which enable him to display his declamatory powers to the full; it is replete with scenes of dramatic interest, and all the pomp and pageantry of the theatre can be employed to the fullest advantage. Yet it can hardly be considered as one of the greatest of Shakespeare's works—if we take as the supreme test of the master's powers his ability to portray human nature—because a theatrical atmosphere of unreality environs almost all the characters. Shakespeare, when he wrote "Julius Cæsar," was hardly treading on firm ground. He was dealing with what tradition and the mellowing influence of time would have us believe rather than with men as they actually were. A halo of noble sentiments, disinterestedness, and patriotism dims the sordid motives of the conspirators. Brutus' noble mind wavers tremulously between his love for his friend and benefactor and his duty towards the commonwealth; Cassius is more brutal but honest in his methods; and the revel-loving Antony appears as the embodiment of what a loyal friend should be. But as a matter of sober fact, Cæsar's tragic end was brought about by those same party passions, petty intrigues, and personal jealousies which recur in the history of every epoch.

Another curious feature of "Julius Cæsar" is the small part played in it by women. There are only two—Portia and Calpurnia. Portia appears in two scenes and has eighty-seven lines, while Calpurnia is restricted to one scene and has twenty-six lines. Yet Portia remains one of the noblest creations of Shakespeare's genius. He has managed in a few lines to portray a character so fully that we seem to know Portia intimately the moment she steps on to the stage. But Portia and Calpurnia, in spite of their relatively unimportant rôles, remain the only two really human characters in the play; for Shakspeare, having little to draw from but his imagination, has made them women, rather than mere historic characters. "Julius Cæsar" is essentially an all-star play. There are three rôles of almost equal importance—Mark Antony, Brutus, and Cassius. Cæsar himself has but little to do, and his utterances hardly approach the summit of Shakespeare's powers. He always appears to speak not because he has something of importance to say, but because he must pass the time until the moment comes for his assassination. His utterances for the most part are vapid, full of bombast and arrogance tempered by superstitious fears, and are the antithesis of Cæsar's character as it has come down to us in his written works, which are models of simplicity and conciseness.

The soul of the great actor is rent asunder when considering a production of "Julius Cæsar" by indecision whether to assume the rôle of Brutus or Antony. Brutus is undoubtedly the principal part, and lends itself to a superb display of the whole gamut of emotions before working up to the tragic scene at Philippi; but, as a rule, Mark Antony's great speech in the Forum proves an irresistible attraction, and the greatest actors have generally selected the part in preference to that of the more emotional, but less rhetorical, Brutus.

Of all the rôles in "Julius Cæsar" that of Mark Antony is the most untrue to life; it is in direct contradiction to Shakespeare's own representation in "Antony and Cleopatra," and totally at variance with the fairly extensive knowledge which we derive from history; but the superb oration causes us to forget all else. Even the speech in the Forum has little foundation in fact. There is no record of it and no mention of it by any contemporary writer except a vague statement by Cicero that Antony inflicted some harm to the cause of the conspirators by an injudicious speech to the mob on the occasion of Cæsar's funeral. The rough soldier, prolonged reveller, and free wine-bibber of Gaul could hardly have developed any great oratorical powers in the camps of the savage North or amidst the silken dalliance of his life at Rome. The subtle rhetorician of the Forum could hardly have degenerated into the idle paramour of Cleopatra's barge; that acute mind which swayed the multitude first like the gentle ripple of a breeze over a ripening cornfield, and then as a mighty wind tearing through a forest, would hardly have allowed itself to be lured to destruction by the coquetry of Egypt's Queen. The Antony of "Julius Cæsar" does not appear as "a plain, blunt man that love my friend," but rather as an astute politician of the Machiavellian School. The native energy and high spirits of Cæsar's lieutenant disappear, and we are lost in admiration not at the physical and animal qualities of the man, but at the astuteness and subtleness of his intellect.

The reproduction on Monday night at His Majesty's

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Theatre was interesting by reason of Mr. Arthur Bourchier's appearance in the rôle of Brutus, a part he has never taken since his Oxford undergraduate days. Let us say at once that Mr. Bourchier is not altogether suited to the rôle. He looked a hardy Roman centurion rather than the æsthetic, handsome, Hamlet-like conspirator of Shakespeare's creation, alternately trembling between his love for his benefactor and his duty towards his country. Some of his scenes were, however, extremely well acted, and he brought into excellent play the gentler emotions which Brutus felt when Portia pleads with him in the orchard for a renewal of the confidence of their matrimonial vows. At the assassination of Cæsar his acting was lacking in dramatic effect, and he wandered about the Senate more as a spectator than a man racked by varying emotions. His speech in the Forum was also lacking in power and would not have turned a vote at an East Notts by-election. His scene in the tent at Philippi was far better, and marked the highest point his powers reached during the evening.

When Cassius departs and Brutus is left alone in his tent to face the awful spectre of the murdered Cæsar, who warns him that they will meet at Philippi, a remarkable change came over Mr. Bourchier's acting. Brutus was no more; in his place we saw before us Macbeth, and Mr. Bourchier seems to revel in the change. Again, on the battlefield of Philippi the influence of Macbeth predominated, and we almost expected Brutus to drop his dagger and exclaim, "Why should I play the Roman fool and die on mine own sword?"

Nothing can be added to what has been said a hundred times in praise of Sir Herbert Tree's Mark Antony. It remains one of the very best things he has ever done, second to none, except, perhaps, his Richard II. The oration in the Forum stands out as a masterpiece. The actor towered head and shoulders above all others, and his marvellous handling of the crowd was never in greater evidence. Mr. Gill as Cassius was good, though, if our memory serves us right, he has usually taken the rôle of Brutus, and we are inclined to think that part suits him better. Mr. George as Julius Cæsar looked the part to perfection, and all that he had to do was well done. Here let us pay tribute to as good a piece of acting as we have ever seen on the English stage—namely, the Ligarius of Henry Morrel. Miss Frances Dillon made an excellent Calpurnia, and looked a worthy and dignified wife to Cæsar. Lady Tree acted Portia with genuine feeling, although we prefer her in her old rôle of Lucius, which was taken with great effect by Miss Margery Maude. The setting of the play is of course above criticism, and its immense popularity is shown by the faded colour of Mark Antony's robe, which, after prolonged use, has become several shades lighter than that of the other Senators.

"MARGARET CATCHPOLE" AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S

Mr. Laurence Irving has been accused by several of the critics of freakishness, eccentricity, and "erraticness." One of them went so far in writing of his new production as to dub him the reinless "undergrad" among our playwrights and managers, and thus committed himself to a word—we have placed it in inverted commas—which is as hopeless as "genteel" and "serviette." All this because Mr. Laurence Irving has had the courage to be audacious, to produce a play at which all other managers would either laugh or shudder. In our opinion, "Margaret Catchpole" was well worth producing at this time. It comes to the jaded playgoer as a draught of honest beer to the man who has been supplied with absinthe. It is a stirring, picturesque piece, full of good sentiment, good villainy, good drama, and good comedy, and it has been produced by Mr. Irving as nearly as possible in the manner of the period to which it belongs. The result is that the very out-of-dateness of the thing makes it new and refreshing. We found ourselves vastly amused and interested from the rise of the curtain to its fall. The morris dances fascinated us, and the fine lilt of the old sea-songs made our blood run quickly. The series of pictures of life in the closing years of the eighteenth century, with smugglers and pressgangs, ostlers and turnkeys, preventive officers and Bow Street runners, rustic capers and tableaux of the deck of Lord Howe's flagship, H.M.S. Queen Charlotte, on the Glorious First of June, delighted the eye. The whole thing, with its front scenes and monologues, asides and high-flown sentences, the comic relief and desperate struggles, seemed to bring to life a collection of old prints. We left behind us as we passed into the theatre a town full of taxi-cabs, motor-omnibuses, and streets with people waiting to catch a glimpse of King George V. on his way to see the first performance of a musical comedy. But no sooner had we taken our seat in the theatre, opened the programme and found inside it a replica of one which was framed by our grandfathers, and listened for a moment to the full-blooded strains of a song to which the sailors of King George III. had danced on board his wooden warships, than we found ourselves flung back into a century dead and done with and almost forgotten, and there was not one moment during the evening when a modernism of any sort brought us back to the time and period we had left outside the theatre.

Surely this alone is an achievement. Surely this is enough to take all imaginative people with a sense of history to the Duke of York's Theatre. But when it is added that there is not one part in a long list which is not admirably performed, and that four of them are played to perfection, "Margaret Catchpole" should fill the theatre for many weeks. Quite apart from its historical value, the story of this old play is full of fun, excitement, vigour, and thrill. Margaret Catchpole herself makes a charming figure, and she performs deeds of daring and kindness which are enough to fill twenty plays as they are written to-day. Miss Mabel Hackney went through with it splendidly. She changed her clothes as rapidly as an Egyptian makes cigarettes, and she looked just as charming as the serving-wench of the Priory Farm as she did in the clothes of a jolly Jack Tar and an ostler's boy. She scaled 40ft. walls with all the agility of a member of an American gymnast troupe. She swung herself into the saddle and rode astride to the manner born. She had her moments, too, of genuine pathos, and in the short Court scene her scream made the blood run cold. Miss Hackney's performance was, indeed, in the nature of a tour de force. Mr. Laurence Irving as John Luff, Captain of a gang of smugglers, has never done anything so full of sardonic humour and Machiavellian cunning. He was a mixture of Svengali and Captain Hook, Uriah Heep and Scrooge, Tartuffe and Fagin. It was a delicious performance, lifted out of the ruck of mere stage villainy by Mr. Irving's extraordinary sense of character. Over and over again he lit the part up with a touch of genius. We forgot that John Luff was being played by Mr. Laurence Irving, and almost from his first entrance were convinced that it was John Luff and no other. Mr. Irving's possibilities are limitless.

The Jim Cook of Mr. A. Field Fisher was a gem. Whether drunk or playing the man, whether a begrimed smuggler or a spruce Jack Tar, Mr. Fisher made an irresistibly comic figure. Very high praise must be given to Mr. Percy Nash as Philip, a footman, who kept the house in fits of laughter; while Miss Beatrice Smith as Mrs. Clayton of Ipswich, Miss

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Amy Fauchette, hostess of "The Dog and Bone," Lambeth, Mr. R. G. Beard as Lieutenant Blunt, Mr. Cecil Kinnaird as the Preventive Officer were admirable. Mr. Godfrey Tearle as William Lund, the handsome weak lover for whom Margaret Catchpole sacrificed herself, was an attractive figure. He played with breadth and dash. The play is described as an exciting, vivacious, and spectacular drama, and it answers to the description completely. We advise every one who is tired of sex problems, adaptations from the French, and musical plays which have been made in Germany, to go to the Duke of York's Theatre if he desires a new sensation. It will be a well-spent evening.

"ARMS AND THE MAN" AT THE CRITERION

Mr. F. C. Whitney is imitating the octopus. Hardly a week goes by that we do not read curiously-worded theatrical announcements as to his spreading ventures. Already he has the Lyric Theatre for the "Chocolate Soldier," the Whitney Theatre, which, as the Strand, has had a chequered career, the Criterion Theatre in which to exploit Mr. Arnold Daly, who is under his management for a term of years, and Covent Garden Theatre, where he intends to produce a series of operas. As Mr. Charles Frohman draws in his horns, Mr. F. C. Whitney throws his out. Where the English stage would be without American money it is difficult to say.

Mr. Whitney has done well by giving London playgoers an opportunity to see the work of Mr. Arnold Daly, but we think that he would have been better advised had he placed him in an original play. Mr. George Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man" is one of those numerous pieces which may be vastly enjoyed once, and then only if it is played to perfection. As it happens, it has been revived several times. We saw it at the Avenue Theatre seventeen years ago, at the Court Theatre with Mr. Granville Barker, and a little later at the Savoy Theatre, when Mr. Robert Loraine played Bluntschli as Bluntschli should be played. In that particular production Miss Lillah McCarthy was the Raina, and Miss Auriol Lee the Louka. Both actresses were admirably suited. Mr. Granville Barker experimented with Sergius, His performance reminded us of a sheep-dog imitating a lamb. In other words, he was much too much like Mr. Granville Barker ever to give any suggestion whatever of Sergius.

We found Mr. Arnold Daly distinctly good. We liked his absolute absorption and his effortless humour. The only fault that could be found with him was that he was too gentlemanlike. He gave no suggestion of the bagman in uniform. He might have been brought up in an atmosphere of afternoon tea-fights. In the first Act, however, his picture of the man utterly unable to withstand sleep, and his final fall upon the delicate bed of the high-flown maiden was altogether beyond praise. There is something rather pleasant, too, in his touch of Irish brogue, which is charmingly reminiscent of Mr. Leonard Boyne. We look forward to seeing Mr. Arnold Daly in other and newer parts.

In all probability Mr. Daly was labouring under a disadvantage on the first night of Mr. Whitney's revival. It was only too evident that the piece had been hurriedly rehearsed and more or less thrown upon the stage. The long waits between the Acts were very tiresome, and the scenery is what may be termed scratch. So far as the male members of the cast were concerned Mr. Daly was admirably supported. It goes without saying that Mr. Fisher White and Mr. James Hearn were exactly right. They always are. Mr. Dawson Milward, too, surprised us by showing us a sense of character of which we had not believed him to be possessed. He was a little too refined, perhaps, a little too clean and well-groomed; but he was, on the whole, the best of the Sergiuses. Miss Jean Stirling Mackinlay gave a delightful performance. She had not got quite the devil of Miss Auriol Lee, but she had more sense of character. She suggested the present type very well indeed. It is when we come to the Raina of Miss Margaret Halstan, the Madame Petkoff of Miss Geraldine Oliffe, that we are obliged to speak unfavourably. Miss Halstan was not Raina. She over-emphasised almost every line and could not have taken in any man who was not both deaf and blind. Her movements were as awkward as her manner was insincere. We should have liked to have seen Miss Mackinlay in the part. Miss Oliffe never for a moment gave any hint of the characteristic mixture of simplicity and cunning of the elderly Servian woman. She was made up to look pretty, and more nearly resembled the wife of an unsuccessful stockbroker living in West Kensington than any other person. All the scenes in which these two actresses were concerned went for little. It was curious to see how all the comedy and point of the play was lost and misunderstood by them. We shall look forward to Mr. Daly's appearance in another play.

"NAN" AT THE LITTLE THEATRE

Mr. Grant Richards has just republished "Nan" in a cheaper edition (1s. 6d. net), with an introduction, which fits in happily with Miss Lillah McCarthy's matinées of the same play at the Little Theatre on Tuesdays and Fridays. In his introduction Mr. Masefield says that—

> Tragedy at its best is a vision of life. The heart of life can only be laid bare in the agony and exultation of dreadful acts. The vision of agony, or spiritual contest, pushed beyond the limits of the dying personality, is exalting and cleansing. It is only by such vision that a multitude can be brought to the passionate knowledge of things exulting and eternal.

In point of fact, the whole introduction is worth earnest consideration, for it deals with questions that are not habitually dealt with. It is marked by his new, and unfortunate, manner of rolling what one may call "bullets" of sentences, and projecting them across his page. It is an irritating manner; but this introduction is so short that the irritation has not time to leave its effect. The following paragraph will serve to exemplify both the truth of his observations and the irritating manner of their delivery. "Commonplace people dislike tragedy, because they dare not suffer and cannot exult. The truth and rapture of man are holy things, not lightly to be scorned. A carelessness of life and beauty marks the glutton, the idler, and the fool in their deadly path across history." But when he goes on to say that "the poetic impulse of the Renaissance is now spent," and that "the poetic drama, the fruit of that impulse, is now dead," then he goes past wisdom, and enters on debate. In any case, the introduction is more than useful, inasmuch as it is his manifesto as to what, in his opinion, modern drama is, or should be; and therefore it is his explanation and prologue for "Nan."

It is too late in the day to praise "Nan." It has had its examination in these columns more than once, both as literature and as drama. It has met its tribute as one of the very few plays for many years past which give us ground to believe that English drama is not moribund. With regard to its present production a few words may be said. Strictly speaking, "Nan" is scarcely a tragedy. In the paucity of definition it is necessary to call it a tragedy, in the same way as we should speak of "Riders to the Sea" as a tragedy. Mr. Masefield is penetratingly true when he speaks of the exaltation that tragedy produces. The exaltation comes from the contemplation of the laws inherent in the beginning of the drama that must needs logically lead to the climax of terror. But when Nan stabs Dick Gurvil the act leaves a strong feeling behind it that that act is not so much a logical conclusion as an escape from the conditions of the play. If this be no more than an impression, it is at least an impression that follows and troubles the spectator for some time after witnessing the play. It is this, and the insistence on gloom, that go to produce the strange feeling of depression it leaves behind. And, as Mr. Masefield says, tragedy is exalting and cleansing, not depressing.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Despite this strange feeling of hesitancy, "Nan" is, as has been said, one of the few plays of the present day of which one can say that it cannot be permitted to die easily. That it should only be possible to see it at rare intervals, and then only at matinées, is a thing that makes one fear for dramatic art. At the Little Theatre most of the original cast is maintained—that is to say, one can still see Mrs. Tapping as Mrs. Pargetter, Mary Jerrold as Jenny, Mr. Hignett as old Gaffer Pearce, and, above all, Lillah McCarthy as Nan. It is a fault in the play, both in reading and on the stage, that old Gaffer Pearce is heard rather too much. The rare poetry of his noteworthy speeches would be enhanced by judicious elimination. He is not so much a person in the play as a symbol, and a symbol should not be insisted on. Nevertheless, Mr. Hignett's is a very beautiful and finished performance. As for Nan, Miss McCarthy adds a charm every time she puts it on the stage. There are signs of strain here and there that need to be toned away: such as her pose when Nan serves the Gaffer to supper. Mr. Claude King as Dick Gurvil is, however, a newer performance, but he lacked neither naturalness nor conviction, except, perhaps, in the concluding scene. Here he has to share the blame partly with the author. Mr. Fewlass Llewellyn as the Rev. Mr. Drew, and Mr. Arnold Lucy as Captain Dixon, made an admirable and inimitable couple. "Nan" should attract many to the Little Theatre.

THE STAGE OF THE FUTURE

From the office of Poesia, a so-called "international review" established at Milan to expound the principles of the Futurists – a militant association of Italian politicians, sociologists, writers, painters, and musicians who are bent apparently on revolutionising the world in each and every respect—we have received a manifesto on dramatic art, in which various old truisms are blended with several novel propositions. Playwrights are exhorted to cultivate a thorough contempt for the public, to hold "immediate success" in horror, to relegate love and illicit passion to a secondary and episodical place in their works, and to refrain from writing any so-called "touching" plays, in which, for instance, a mother loses her child or a girl is prevented from marrying her lover, all matters of that description being regarded by the Futurists as "balderdash." They also express profound disdain for every attempt to represent history and pourtray historical characters on the stage, and tell us that dramatic art must henceforth give expression to the great Futurist dream born of contemporary life, which has been intensified by speed on land, at sea, and in the air, and is dominated by steam and electricity. Our plays are to deal with the reign of Machinery, with the great revolutionary waves which stir the masses, and with the new ideas and scientific discoveries which have transformed human sensibility and mentality. Briefly, dramatic art must no longer be "psychological photography, but an intoxicating synthesis of life on significant and typical lines." Further, pending the abolition of all marks of approval or disapproval in a theatre, authors and actors are to enjoy "the rapture of being hissed," on which subject Signor Marinetti, by whom this entertaining manifesto is drafted, proudly adds:—"I have the joy of knowing that my genius, which has been hissed repeatedly by the public in France and Italy, will never be entombed beneath any weight of applause!"

Thirteen gentlemen who describe themselves as poets (we hope they are), five painters (perhaps of stage scenery), and one musician endorse Signor Marinetti's views; but no actor is brave enough to express a desire to be hissed, and the opinions of theatrical managers are naturally ignored. Some of them, however, may be inclined to adopt the idea of staging "dramas of speed," plentifully interspersed with aeroplanes, submarines, and taxi-cabs. Doubtless it would gladden the hearts of the Futurists to hear of Mr. Grahame-White and Mr. Farman competing as the "hero" and the "villain" in, let us say, the "flies" at Drury Lane.

DUTCH PICTURES AT THE FRENCH GALLERY

The ninety-ninth exhibition of pictures at this well-known gallery is an interesting one. Johannes Bosboom and the youngest Maris were both in their way entitled to rank as masters, and their works deserve careful study. Perhaps from the point of view of the student this is more particularly true of Maris, in whose style and technique the process of development is very marked, and the instruction to be gained proportionately greater. It is a pity for this reason that the pictures could not be dated—it is not difficult in most cases to infer the time of development, but certainty would have been preferable. At a comparatively early stage in his progress, as it would seem, William Maris reached a high measure of skill in that smooth and detailed finish so dear to the mid-Victorian epoch; and had his reputation rested upon these earlier works alone it would have stood high, for they always exhibit that close to fidelity and that appreciation of light and atmosphere that marked his work to the last. But as he progressed he gained extraordinarily in breadth and power, and shed completely the laboured methods which appealed to his earlier taste, and devoted himself more and more successfully to emphasising sunshine and atmosphere and colour and all that goes to the truer rendering of Nature; and the rest followed inevitably—cows and ducklings and what not expressed in these bolder and broader touches sprang into far more vivid and pulsating life than when detail obtruded itself overmuch in his artistic outlook. And few painters have ever understood better and expressed more sympathetically the lazy life of man and beast in the "sleepy world of streams" which he affects—the world of slow-running waters, of lush grasses in brilliant sunshine, of rich overhanging foliage and deep brown shadows, of level stretches of marsh-land and straight dykes melting away into grey distances of sea and sky. To select special pictures for praise is more difficult, however; there is in his work a certain sameness of sentiment side by side with the wonderful advance in execution. Perhaps the two most typical of his mature power are "The Young Brood" and "The Edge of the Meadow"—the former a beautiful study of ducklings by the waterside in vivid sunlight, with a background of rich foliage; the latter a marvellous pourtrayal of cattle in vivid sunlight, both rendered in a singularly sure style of great breadth and power. For sheer joie de vivre few painters are his equal, and corresponding is the joy to the beholder, who must be cold indeed if he does not respond to the appeal.

Johannes Bosboom is of a different cast of thought and vision, and his limitations are more marked. He painted in oils as well as water-colours; in the latter medium he is an undoubted master, in the former a painter of little more than average powers. He delights in rendering church interiors, but when using water-colours he is fully alive to all the mystery and charm of an ancient and historic building, while in oils he seems to be concerned with no higher aims than to record its features with cold correctness. The contrast is thus extraordinary. Some of his water-colours leave a haunting impression behind of brilliant lights cutting athwart dim and finely-graduated shadows, in a fashion that suggests all the mystery and variety of life itself, its pathos and its joy; in the other medium he seems to aim at nothing but the display of technical skill. Such a picture as "Visiting the Church," with its combination of grey walls, dim shadows, and streaks of golden light, is not easily forgotten; nor is the master less powerful in his rarer outdoor studies—"A Dutch Farm," with its noble breadth of handling, its softness of line, and its wealth of subdued colour, and "The Town Hall, Hoorn," with its delightful soft red and grey tints, and its deep feeling for the long traditions of an ancient town. And the struggling light of early morning has seldom found truer expression than in the beautiful "Early Visitors," which shows the dawning light penetrating a grey church interior. Some clever sketches, too, convey the same or even greater sense of mastery of the power to express space and form with a true and harmonious perspective both of line and colour.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE NEW ERA IN CHINA

Article I.—The Constitutional Movement

By Lancelot Lawson

In spite of the fact that railway communication will carry the traveller from Charing-cross to the heart of China well within a fortnight, and with an interval of less than a hour upon the sea; in spite of the fact also that, comparatively speaking, within a few minutes news may be transmitted six thousand miles over a long, thin wire stretching from the extreme West to the remote East, little seems to be known of the amazing transition that is in progress throughout the length and breadth of the great Chinese Empire. In no sphere of national activity has this transition made itself felt to such a wondrous extent as in that relating to the constitutional movement. As far back as 1905 a Commission consisting of five high Chinese statesmen, headed by Duke Tsai Tse, made a tour of the world with the view of studying political conditions in other countries preparatory to the shaping of a Constitutional Government for China. Since that time a National Assembly, or Senate, as well as Provincial Assemblies, have been instituted. An Imperial Decree, dated August 27th, 1908, proclaimed that in 1917 a Parliament would be established, and subsequently, owing to the pressure of public opinion, the period of preparation was shortened and the year 1913 substituted. And only recently the news has been received that the Grand Council and the Grand Secretariat have been swept away, and Cabinet, Privy Council, and General Staff inaugurated. It is a matter for more than passing regret that Prince Ching, whose instability of character and neglect of duty are notorious, should have become the first Prime Minister of China, and that the Manchu element should largely predominate in the new Administration. But these circumstances do not necessarily point to the conclusive triumph of the reactionary forces at the outset of the new era in China. It is almost an axiom among those who lay claim to any knowledge of the Empire that so uncertain is the situation, so many and complex its aspects and its possibilities, that to prophesy or even to speculate betrays the quality of ignorant temerity rather than that of prescience.

Again and again the constitutional movement in China at the present time has been compared to that which existed in Japan between 1880 and 1890. But certain all-important differences appear to have been overlooked. Japan possessed in the late Prince Ito a statesman of commanding genius, a statesman whose constructive work has been likened to that accomplished by Bismarck and Cavour. In China the ship has been launched, but there is no hand competent to take the helm. Ito was not merely a statesman of Japan; he was a giant in the universe itself, an ornament to a generation. The name Ching is a byword for odious contempt in China.

The foundations of constitutional government in Japan were laid in the unswerving loyalty and devotion of the whole nation towards the Sovereign. In the truest sense of the term, the Throne was "sacred and inviolable." In China, however, an alien dynasty rules, and a strong revolutionary party, which daily gathers adherents, has come into existence. In seeking a model China not unnaturally discovered that the Japanese Constitution would be best suited to her needs. Thus, while some very important concessions are to be made to the people, the Emperor is to remain an absolute autocrat. With him will rest the power to veto legislation. Parliament will be merely a deliberative assembly. It is argued that as the Constitution is a voluntary offering of the Emperor, not a surrender in consequence of a conflict with his subjects, then the Emperor must be supreme. Likewise it is contended that as he has the right to sanction measures, so he must have also the right to withhold sanction.

The privileges that the Constitution will confer cannot fail to be regarded as substantial by the Chinese masses, who for so many centuries have been kept in a state of political and intellectual bondage. There is to be freedom of speech, freedom of meeting, and freedom of the Press. The right to form societies is also to be allowed, and the sanctity of the dwelling-house respected. Yet it is already plainly discernible that unless the hour brings forth the man these privileges will be ignored and the Constitution set at defiance. China will find it impossible to maintain a corrupt and inefficient autocracy together with even a restricted measure of representative government and popular liberty. In Japan, where loyalty is still the dominating creed of the people, frequent murmurings are heard in regard to the iron-bound limitations of the Constitution, and the complaint is made that the Throne has become the shield for the autocratic sway of clan government.

Ito had not been slow to perceive the baneful influence of party politics in the West, and, while in framing a Constitution for Japan he found that the Prussian Constitution was alone of assistance in his labours, he determined to evolve something that went considerably farther than this instrument. Hence the Japanese Constitution not only perpetuates the very useful State doctrines of the Emperor's divinity, but it places in his hands the supreme power. The Chinese are anxious to adopt the Japanese model in all its essential details, but unfortunately they cannot reproduce Japanese conditions. Apart altogether from the circumstances to which I have alluded, and which in themselves render comparison between the two countries wholly misleading, it must not be forgotten that China is a vast Empire with inadequate communications, and that Viceroys and Governors in the distant provinces will naturally oppose constitutional principles in their desire to retain the ill-gotten fruits of oppression.

The West pretends that in representative government it has given its most precious gift to the Old World. It cannot be denied that the granting of constitutional privileges has raised from serfdom the masses of the East. But, once released, those masses immediately clamour for more privileges, and their rulers then begin to devise means by which such aspirations may be kept effectually in check. The nations of the West are afflicted with the same problems, although in their case the evil is more deep-seated, because centuries of freedom have created a vigorous, assertive, and at the same time highly organised democracy. Both Japan and China wisely realise that so-called representative government has its dangers as well as its advantages to the State, and they are anxious that their Legislatures should endure only as deliberative assemblies, and that their Ministers should alone be responsible to the Throne. But once having built up their fundamental institutions according to the examples of the West, they are destined to go the way of the West, and to be face to face with problems as acute as those which exist in the West. In China the growth of public opinion has been both sudden and sturdy. The hastening of constitutional government was the result of an insistent demand which ran from end to end of the land. Delegates from the provinces presented petitions smeared in blood; thousands of people surrounded the Yamens begging that a Parliament should be summoned instantly; and the Tze Chung Yuan, or National Assembly, and the Provincial Assemblies memorialised the Throne. Although half of the members of the Tze Chung Yuan were directly appointed by the Throne, and nominees of the Provincial Governors were also largely represented, the demands for the early establishment of a Parliament were received with enthusiastic unanimity. While in session this body did not hesitate to enter into open conflict with the Government, and not infrequently actions of Ministers were frankly criticised. In some quarters the early experiment of constitutional government has been regarded as somewhat in the nature of a failure. If to stimulate public opinion is unwise in the best interests of State, then the pessimistic view would be warranted. That public opinion has hastened the establishment of a Parliament and has brought about the formation of a Cabinet is beyond dispute. Meanwhile the Tze Chung Yuan is no longer in session, and there are not wanting ominous signs that the vermilion pencil is at work again writing out progress and writing in destruction.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

The past week has been practically without incident. Companies have come out and most of them have failed to attract the public. It may be considered that, on the whole, the business in the company-promoting world has been flat. The Galician Pipe Line, reported upon by Sir Boverton Redwood and Mr. Eastlake, seemed a fair gamble, and the Imperial and Foreign prospectus, with its array of names, will probably secure some support. The Cockshutt Plow was a sound Canadian industrial. There seems a perfect craze amongst promoters for bringing out what they call debentures. It has always been supposed in the City that a debenture is a sort of mortgage, and a mortgage in the eyes of most people presupposes something to be mortgaged. But the modern promoter thinks that he can issue debentures on nothing at all, or on what practically amounts to nothing. Thus he borrows his money at 6 per cent. and takes all the common stock for himself, markets this at the best price he can, and trusts to Providence that the company will earn enough to pay its debenture interest. The Canadians are very fond of this system of finance, and are continually giving us these so-called debenture issues. We are getting a great deal too much Canadian finance in the City, and I am quite certain that sooner or later we shall see a very serious collapse. For example, this week a perfectly ridiculous Canadian company is offering itself for approbation. It is called the Canada Provident Investment Corporation. Some of its shares are pounds sterling, and some of its shares are dollar shares. Although it has been in existence since 1900, it has not the politeness to give us any particulars with regard to its past history beyond telling us that the cumulative preference shares have received their dividends. Some moderately good names of Canadian politicians appear s trustees, and that is the best thing I can say of the concern. I hope none of my readers will subscribe to the venture.

Canada Cement Company.—The Canada Cement Company was floated in England as a merger or combine of some cement companies that had been working in Canada, and the 7 per cent. preference stockholders are now asked to convert their shares into mortgages bearing 5 per cent. This company appears to be getting into trouble, and the Canadian Government has ordered an investigation into its affairs on the instigation of Sir Sandford Fleming, a director of the C.P.R. This may or may not mean much. English investors will remember that Mr. Aitken, who is a Member of Parliament for Ashton-under-Lyme, was interested in the formation of the merger, and Sir Sandford Fleming desires that the circumstances of the flotation should be inquired into. Information with regard to this company is slow in coming over. Under all circumstances I cannot but advise my readers to clear out, especially as I am told that 40 per cent. of the Canada Cement Companies' plant is lying idle to-day.

Money.—Nothing has happened in the Money Market during the past week. Gradually the public deposits are being released, and the money held up in the Bank of England is coming into circulation. This will tell on the market. But there is no demand for money except on the part of the trading community. From the financial point of view the bull account has been so largely reduced that the Stock Exchange now requires very little cash. The rise in Home Rails, of course, added a good many millions to the demand, but, as the bull account here has been reduced, the position is righting itself.

Foreigners.—In the Foreign Market the bulls of Peru Preferred still get out whenever they can work the price up to 43. As regularly as it goes to $43\frac{1}{8}$ so does stock come upon the market. This is a warning to those who hold this share that they should follow the example of their betters and make money whilst the sun shines. Tintos have been bought, and this stock appears one of the best speculations in the House. I should not be surprised to see a ten point rise here within the next month.

Home Rails.—For some time past I have been advising everybody to buy the junior stocks of the Great Central, and I am glad to say that my readers have done well through following my advice. Great Central Deferred were $10\frac{1}{2}$. They are now over 16. Great Central Preferred have also risen in like manner. I am now getting nervous, for I observe that all the newspapers are puffing these two stocks. This is a most suspicious thing, and shows me that some of the big bulls are anxious to get out and are using the newspapers for this purpose. I have therefore very little hesitation in advising my readers to take their profits now. Great Central A and B were always a speculative lock-up. They are not likely to get a dividend for three years, and with such stocks a bull account is always dangerous. The public soon get tired of waiting, and the price sags away. The leading Heavies remain, however, remarkably steady, as indeed they have every reason to be. The Traffics continue to be good, and, if we get a fine Whitsuntide, this will set a seal on the rise in profits for the current half-year. There is a little boom in Dover A and Little Chats, and it is said that a bull pool has been buying these stocks on wild talk about the coal discoveries. No one should venture on a gamble in either of these shares. They are very likely to be landed at the top. The only safe things in the Home Railway market are the sound dividend-payers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

YANKEES.—Although American Rails have had a good rise during the week, I do not think that they will go much higher. My friends on the other side tell me that the big bankers do not want to see speculation get out of hand. They will therefore keep the market down. Trade in America is dull. There is not to be any slump; but whenever stocks get beyond a certain level they are to be sold by the bankers. This, however, does not apply to copper stocks, which are to be taken in hand and moved up. The greatest nonsense has been talked about the Rates decision. If it means anything, it means exactly what everybody supposed it would mean—namely, that the Government has the right to interfere with any Corporation when it thinks it is doing too much business. Every big company in the United States tries to obtain a monopoly of the business it is engaged in. Everybody in the world is striving for the same end. There is nothing either unnatural or disgraceful in monopoly. It never lasts for any length of time, and all laws aimed at it must fail because they are against nature. I do not believe that the Trust decision will have the least effect upon any of the other trusts.

RUBBER.—The Rubber Market, although it has improved a little from the worst, is still absolutely dead, and the public declines to either buy or sell. It is a good job for the market that holders of shares have such faith in their securities, for there is no doubt that, had it been otherwise, we should have seen a very serious collapse in values. The big dividends have steadied everything. The Linggi directors deserve the greatest credit in refusing to pay more than 87½ final dividend. They were expected to pay 100 per cent., and some people wanted them to pay 125 as the final dividend. They, however, prefer to build up the reserve fund. If all the other rubber companies followed their example, rubber shares would be much sounder investments than they are to-day; but the finance of the rubber director is the finance of a boomster who is always trying to live up to the fancy prices forced upon him by the Stock Exchange. The prices of the best shares are now almost on a reasonable level.

OIL.—Nothing has happened in the Oil Market except the Lobitos report, which, of course, was bad. It is very likely, however, that this company will have a better chance when all its wells get on to the deep oil. The cost of the other wells has now been written down, and the balance-sheet is a very praiseworthy document. This will be all the better for the shareholders when they once find oil, for they will not be compelled to use their profits for the purpose of writing down lost assets. Oil shares stick, and if I were a holder I should certainly take my profit. It is quite on the cards that the promoters may get tired of keeping up a market that the public does not come into. Prices, in my opinion, are too high throughout the whole Oil Market and are not justified by any results.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir Market still remains dead, and everybody in the City says that they are only waiting for a rise to get out finally. The disappearance of Wernher Beit from this market has had the most serious effect, and, in my opinion, it will take six months for people to get over the shock. Nevertheless, when everyone is advising a sale wise people often buy.

RHODESIANS.—The Rhodesian Market is if anything duller than in Kaffirs, and nothing seems able to stir people into enthusiasm. Every finance company has huge blocks of Rhodesian shares they want to sell. But each week something comes along that disconcerts them. The other week it was the Jumbo collapse, and now they are offering Willoughbys, in spite of the fact that Mr. Percy Marsden is busily engaged sending out a circular that expatiates on the vast wealth of the company. A deal is on here, but it is too dangerous for me to recommend.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE CRYSTAL PALACE AND THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A false impression has been created due mainly to the inferences of two of your morning contemporaries incorrectly allocating the authorship of the Crystal Palace Empire in miniature idea. This misconception is likely to cause some confusion in connection with the work and very much wider sphere of the domes and grounds of Empire project, contemplated for several years past, of which the Festival of Empire Exhibition is a result, and forms with its leading features, all-red route, and governing characteristics an extensive part of the original and future plan. Will you allow me through THE ACADEMY to foreshadow the very excellent prospect of the Crystal Palace as a permanent exhibition Empire centre being discussed at the Imperial Conference? This probably will arise through the introduction to notice of the proposition—"That the Crystal Palace and grounds (when acquired at a market valuation) should constitute London's gift to the Empire, to be maintained at the expense and by the joint control of the Parliaments in the King's Dominions for expositions of Empire in perpetuity." It has, Sir, been ascertained that there is a remarkable unanimity of opinion among Liberal, Conservative, and Labour politicians and public men throughout the Empire favouring the Crystal Palace becoming the corporate property of the Empire, supported also by London Borough Councils and many members of the London County Council and City Corporation.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

W. A. BAYST.

Woodford-green.

"THE PRINCESS VIRGINIA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We understand that you have printed a letter from Mrs. C. N. Williamson asking you to make it known that the book "Princess Virginia" which we recently published is founded on a story issued about twelve years ago. We believe that Mrs. Williamson also adds that she asked us to state this in the book, and had requested us not to send out copies for review. As you have published Mrs. Williamson's letter, we think it only fair that you should let your readers know—(1) That on the back of the title-page of "Princess Virginia," and facing the Contents, the following note is printed:—"This book is founded on a story by Mrs. C. N. Williamson, published more than ten years ago, but, being entirely rewritten and largely remodelled, 'The Princess Virginia' is practically a new book." (2) In accordance with Mrs. Williamson's wishes, we did not send out copies for review. THE ACADEMY certainly did not have a copy, nor did any other paper.—We are, dear Sir, yours faithfully, METHUEN & CO., LTD.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Ascent of the Bostocks. By Harold Storey. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Gift of the Gods. By Flora Annie Steel. William Heinemann. 2s. net.
The Jew's House. By Fergus Hume. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
The White Owl. By Kate Horn. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
A Woman with a Purpose. By Anna Chapin Ray. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
Nonsense Novels. By Stephen Leacock. John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.
Where Day Begins. By Alfred Buchanan. John Ouseley. 6s.

PERIODICALS

Mercure de France; La Revue; Atlantic Monthly; Book-Prices Current; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Revue Critique; Modern Language Teaching; Book-Buyer; Representation; The Periodical; Journal of the Gipsy Lore Society; Windsor Magazine; Scotia; Revue Bleue; L'Oeuvre; The Triad; Literary Digest.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear.

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

"THE BOOK MONTHLY."

The May "Book Monthly," which is now ready, Sixpence net, contains an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the well-known novelist. It also has various other articles of a literary interest, and all the news about the new books. Its illustrations are an engaging feature as usual, and, in fine, the May "Book Monthly" is worth getting. The publishers are Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send a specimen copy free on application.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY
(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During July & August.	Southampton, Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2039 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JUNE 3, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

Works: TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Offices: 20, CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, W.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport. SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.

SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest References. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE. POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

The best Writing Ink for modern office use
Ask your Stationer for it.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL. — An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions. — For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

Catalogue No. 378.
JUNE SUPPLEMENT TO GLAISHER'S CATALOGUE
Of Popular and Attractive Books
at Cheap Remainder Prices.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON,
(and at 14, George Street, Croydon).
The books are on view at both addresses.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Book-finder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten. 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	671
The Prisoner	672
A Detestable Outrage	672
The Old Gentleman's Opinions	672
Plays or Pamphlets?	674
Reviews:—
Sidelights on Nelson and his Family	675
The Indian Police	676
Life in the Eighteenth Century	677
Contemporary Belgian Poetry	678
The Agonists	679
Henry VIII.'s Personality	680
Shorter Reviews	681
Fiction	682
The Theatre	683
A Modern Magician	685
Music	687
A Storm and its Consequences	688
The Temple Flower-Show	689
A Roman in London	689
Dutch Dykes in England	691
The Boy in the Garden	692
A Shakespeare Bibliography	694
Art	695
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	696
In the Temple of Mammon	698
Books Received	699

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

IT is with deep regret that we note the death of Sir W. S. Gilbert, in a manner sudden and exceptionally sad, during the past week. More than any other librettist he added to the nation's laughter, and the songs and inimitable lyrics, to which Sir Arthur Sullivan's melodies fitted so perfectly, have found their way round the whole world. Sir William Gilbert was something of a martinet in theatrical matters; we happen to know that he always insisted on the parts being rendered precisely in accordance with his own views. As he had never been an actor himself, his instructions in this respect were apt to be unpalatable to those who had to carry out his ideas, and who, having experience of the boards, considered that they knew better than he how a part should be played. "Randall's Thumb," a piece produced at the Court Theatre about the year 1875, was a complete failure, much to Gilbert's disgust and anger, for in his opinion it was the best thing he had written up to that time. This, however, was before the happy days of collaboration with Sullivan which gave us the series of operas whose humour and light-heartedness, even though in many cases enveloping subjects quite out of date, seem ever fresh and never wearisome. A most distinctly humorous effect lies in the extraordinary facility of rhyming with which Sir William could embroider a theme which was not at first glance particularly attractive—take the ditty "When I first put this uniform on," for instance. Apart from the irresistibly comic element, however, which runs through most of the Gilbert-Sullivan compositions, there was a clever daintiness which, wedded to its music, made exceptional appeal; such songs as "The Moon and I," from the "Mikado," and Jack Point's final lament from "The Yeomen of the Guard," may be regarded as very much more than merely "pretty." The law doubtless lost a brilliant exponent in Sir W. S. Gilbert, but the people gained songs which never seem to grwo old and laughter which bids fair to be perennial.

In the course of the conversation in the House of Lords respecting the removal of magistrates from the Worcester Borough Bench, it was stated, and not contradicted, that the chief Radical agent was a member of the Committee to advise the Lord Chancellor on the appointment of Borough Justices. Unless the new system of Advisory Committees is to be reduced to a farce and make-believe, we hold that under no circumstances should the political agents of either party be eligible to serve on these Committees. Political agents are very often solicitors practising in the County or Borough with a large clientèle, and they are especially open professionally and politically to pressure in such a matter as appointments to the Bench. Such agents, it will be apparent, are in either of their capacities badly placed to withstand pressure. On the one hand, the agent may alienate valuable political supporters and imperil the cause and his own position; on the other hand, he may lose valuable clients. No man should be placed in a position—unless necessity compels it—in which he may be called upon to make such sacrifices. We think that both in Counties and Boroughs active members of the existing magistracy should be largely utilised on the Advisory Committees, a certain number of substantial persons of known character being added as amici curiæ in each petty sessional division or borough.

The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral have obtained a faculty permitting excavations to be made within the churchyard in order to examine the state of the foundations of the edifice; preparatory, we believe, to the carrying out of the scheme for an underground tramway in the vicinity. The safety of St. Paul's is undoubtedly a very important thing; but at the present moment the safety of Westminster Abbey seems a more pressing concern. No one who passes the neighbourhood in these days and sees the huge stagings which have been erected close against the fine old walls for the benefit of sightseers during the Coronation Procession, can fail to note the grave danger which might ensue from a carelessly thrown lighted match or a chance spark. With the timber as dry as touchwood after a spell of hot weather and rainless days there would be a furnace in a few minutes. The subject has been mentioned, we are aware, in several daily papers, but it seems to have dropped, and we can only trust that the most stringent watch is being kept against this very real risk. Westminster Abbey is not, of course, the only instance which could be taken, but the mass of inflammable material is particularly obvious there. As to the æsthetic side of the question—the absurdity of absolutely spoiling the appearance of our loveliest and most historic building precisely when we should draw attention to its beauties—this is commented upon in an article on another page of the present issue.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE PRISONER

Day after day goes by without a sound;
More weary grows the silence year by year
For one to whom the things of life appear
As from within a cage with bars set round.
To him, locked in a stillness so profound
No notes of Nature enter glad and clear;
Alone in crowds, apart while seeming near,
A prisoner he, irrevocably bound.
The deaf man isolation knows. But some,
Who see with eyes unseeing, deem this nought.
They care not how a miracle be wrought,
By written word or spelt with patient hands.
Yet through such means may many a solace come:
Gift of the heart that sees—and understands.

C. M. PAINE.

A DETESTABLE OUTRAGE

MR. GEORGE BERNARD SHAW has played many parts in the half-century of his career. We have abundant glimpses of his versatility in his recently published Life. These glimpses are sufficiently appreciative, which may be perhaps attributed to the fact that his biographer enjoyed Mr. Shaw's "abundant sympathy and encouragement" in the production of the work. In our recent review we were guilty of a serious crime of lèse-majesté. We wrote: "There is far too much of the trivial in Professor Henderson's appreciation of his hero." We now come forward in deep contrition:—

By penitence the Eternal's wrath's appeased.

So may it be in our case. How can the description be true of any detail of the sayings and doings of a being who is all-wise in problems of heaven and earth, who knows all about the past, all about the present, and all about the unknown and the unseen—a being who dethrones God, and, wiser than the generations which have preceded him, declares pontifically that "Christ was a failure"?

It is really difficult to comment with any approach to reverence upon the astounding blasphemies which have been attributed to Mr. Shaw, and not denied by him, in his address at Cambridge on Monday last. The question whether Mr. Shaw has beliefs or has none may interest an egregious egotist. We are profoundly indifferent on the personal question. Our protest is against the dissemination of poisonous theories amongst young persons who have been placed for educative purposes in what are supposed to be seminaries of learning. This is what is permitted to be taught to undergraduates and Girton and Newnham students. Mr. Bernard Shaw is reported to have said, "The man who says Christ was the highest possible Being is not worth working with; Christ was a failure. When Charles Darwin came along with his theory of Natural Selection people jumped at it and kicked God out of the window."

We apologise to our readers for reproducing language so atrocious. But we do not observe that the lecturer was kicked out of the window or that he was thrown into the Cam. Unless public attention is called to the vile and blasphemous ravings which are permitted to be poured into the ears of University students, what guarantee can there be that the individual soul and the body politic will not go down to perdition?

There have been many schools of philosophy, but none are good, or bad, enough for Mr. Shaw. Antisthenes is his nearest prototype because of his intense scorn of all other men, and the insolence with which he expressed it. He was also an agnostic, but he hid his agnosticism under a veil of logic, and propounded his views with decorum to those who were disposed to listen to his teaching. Socrates, although he was condemned for corrupting the youth, was a religious man, of high ideals, a scholarly logician. Epicurus was no infidel, and only expounded in his own garden his theories of atoms and the void, following in this respect the teaching of Democritus.

That it is unnecessary to resort to coarse profanity to teach the doctrines of materialism is well known to students of the cogent and dignified hexameters of the noble Lucretius. Restraint and decorum and dignified exposition which can be observed in writings of periods many centuries before Christ have no attraction for the Fabian of to-day. All must be as coarse, as degraded and degrading as possible in order not that logic shall prevail, but that an atmosphere of social hate and religious unbelief may be brought about as the result of unreasoning prejudice.

The ordinary Socialist will not, we fancy, feel indebted to his intellectual leader for the declaration that "Christ was a failure." It has been a stock argument that the Christian religion is Socialistic in its tenets and in its tendency. Certain persons of confused intelligence have described themselves as Christian Socialists. If the Founder of the religion was "a failure," of what value or validity was His teaching? Socialism can no longer parade itself under a veneer of Christian sanction, but must stand forth naked and unashamed as resting for its sanction and basis on flagrant infidelity. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and, knowing them, it will not be so difficult to cast them down to public opprobrium and contempt.

CECIL COWPER.

THE OLD GENTLEMAN'S OPINIONS

BY H. BELLOC

I HAD occasion about a fortnight ago to meet a man more nearly ninety than eighty years of age, who had had special opportunity for discovering the changes of Europe during his long life. He was of the English wealthier classes by lineage, but his mother had been of the French nobility and a Huguenot. His father had been prominent in the diplomacy of a couple of generations ago. He had travelled widely, read perhaps less widely, but had known and appreciated an astonishing number of his contemporaries.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I was interested (without any power of my own to judge whether his decisions were right or wrong) to discover what most struck him in the changes produced by that great stretch of years, all of which he had personally observed: he was born just after Waterloo, and he could remember the Reform Bill.

He surprised me by telling me, in the first place, that the material changes and discoveries, enormous though they were in extent, were not, in his view, the most striking. He was ready to leave it open whether these material changes were the causes of moral changes more remarkable, or merely effects concomitant with these. When I asked him what had struck him most of the great material developments, he told me the phonograph and the aeroplane among inventions; Mendel's observations in the sphere of experimental knowledge; and, in the sphere of pure theory, the breakdown of many things that had been dogmas of physical science in his early manhood.

Since I did not quite understand what he meant by this last, he gave me, after some hesitation, a few examples: That the interior of the earth was molten; that a certain limited number of elements—not all yet isolated, but certainly few in their total – were at the base of all material forms, and were immutable; that the ultimate unit of each of these was a certain indivisible, eternal thing called the Atom; and so forth.

He assured me that views of this sort, extending over a hundred or a thousand other points, were so universally accepted in his time that to dispute them was to be ranked with the unlettered or the fantastic. I asked him if it were so in economics. He said: Yes, in England, where there was a similar dogma of Free Trade: not abroad.

When I asked him why Mendel's published experiments and the theory based upon them had so much impressed him, he said because it was almost the first attempt to apply to the speculative dogmas of biology some standard demonstrably true; and here he wandered off to explain to me why the commonly accepted views upon biology, which had so changed thought in the latter part of his life, were associated with the name of Darwin. Darwin, be assured me, had brought forward no new discovery, but only a new hypothesis, and that only a small and particular hypothesis, whereby to explain the general theory of transformism. This theory, he told me—the unbroken descent of living organisms and their physical connection with one another and with common parents—had been a favourite idea from the beginning of history with many great thinkers, from Lucretius to Buffon and from Augustus of Hippo to Lamarc. Darwin's, the old gentleman assured me, which he had defended with infinite toil, was that the method in which this continuity of descent proceeded was by an infinitely slow process of very small changes differentiating each minute step from the one before and the one after it, and these small changes Darwin's hypothesis referred to a Natural Selection. Nothing else in Darwin's work, he assured me, was novel, and yet it was the one thing which subsequent research had rendered more and more doubtful. Darwin (he said) said nothing new that was also true.

At this point I was moved to contradict the old gentleman, and to say that one unquestioned contribution to science of Darwin, as novel as it was secure, was his patient discovery of the work of earthworms, and of its vast effect. The old gentleman was willing to admit that I was right, but he said he was only speaking of Darwin in connection with transformism and the whimsical way in which his private name (and his errors) had become identified with Evolution in general.

I asked him, since he had such a knowledge of men from observation, why this was so.

"It seems at first sight," he said, "as ridiculous as though we should associate the theory of light with the name of Newton, who inclined to the exploded corpuscular hypothesis, or the general conception of orbital motion in the universe to the great Bacon, who, in point of fact, rudely repudiated the Copernican theory in particular."

"Did he, indeed?" said I, interested.

"I believe so," said the old gentleman; "at any rate you were asking me why Darwin, with his single contribution to the theory of transformism, and that a doubtful one—or, to be accurate, an exploded one—should be associated in the popular mind with the invention of so ancient a theory as that of Evolution. The reason is, I think, no more than that he came at a particular moment when any man doing great quantities of detailed work in this field was bound to stand out exaggeratedly. The society in which he appeared had, until just before his day, accepted a narrow cosmogony, quite unknown to its ancestors. Darwin's book certainly exploded that, and the mind of his time—ignorant as it was of the past—was ready to accept the shattering of its father's idols as a new revelation."

"But you were saying," said I, when he had thus dealt harshly with a great name, "that not the material but the moral changes of your time seemed to you the greatest. Which did you mean?"

"Why, in the first place," said the old man thoughtfully and with some hesitation, "the curiously rapid decline of intelligence, or if you will have it differently, the clouding of thought that has marked the last thirty years. Men in my youth knew what they held and what they did not hold. They knew why they held it or why they did not hold it; but the attempt to enjoy the advantages of two contradictory systems at the same time, and, what is worse, the consulting of a man as an authority upon subjects he had never professed to know are intellectual phenomena quite peculiar to the later years of my life."

I said we of the younger generation had all noticed it, as, for instance, when an honest but imperfectly intelligent chemist was listened to in his exposition of the nature of the soul, or a well-paid religious official was content to expound the consolations of Christianity while denying that Christianity was true.

"But," I continued, "we are usually told that this unfortunate decline in the express powers of the brain is due to the wide and imperfect education of the populace at the present moment."

"That is not the case," answered the old man sharply, when I had made myself clear by repeating my remarks in a louder tone, for he was a little deaf.

"That is not the case. The follies of which I speak are not particularly to be discovered among the poorer classes who have passed through the elementary schools. These" (it was to the schools that he was alluding with a comprehensive pessimism) "may account for the gross decline apparent in the public manners of our people, but not for faults which are peculiar to the upper and middle classes. It is not in the populace, but in those wealthier ranks that you will find the sort of intellectual decay of which I spoke."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I asked him whether he thought the tricks it was now considered cultured to play with mathematics came within the category of this intellectual decay. The old gentleman answered me a little abruptly that he could not judge what I was talking about.

"Why," said I, "do you believe that parallel straight lines *con*verge or *di*verge?"

"Neither," said he, a little bewildered. "If they are parallel they cannot by definition either diverge or converge."

"You are then," said I, "an old-fashioned adherent of the theory of the parabolic universe?" At which sensible reply of mine the old man muttered rather ill-temperedly, and begged me to speak of something else.

I asked him whether the knowledge of languages had not declined in his time. He said, somewhat emphatically, yes, and especially the knowledge of French, assuring me that in his early years many a Fellow of a College at Oxford or at Cambridge was capable of speaking that tongue in such a fashion as to make himself understood. On the other hand, he admitted that German and Spanish were more widely known than they had been, and Arabic certainly far more widely diffused among those officials of the Empire who took their work seriously.

When I asked him whether politics were more corrupt as time proceeded, he said No, but more cynical: and as to morals he would not judge, for he was certain that as one vice was corrected another appeared in its place.

What he told me he most deplored in the social system of his country was the power of the police and of the statistician by whom the policeman was guided. This he ascribed to the growth of great towns, to civic cowardice, and to a new taboo laid upon uniformed and labelled public authorities, who are now regarded as sacred, and also inordinately feared.

"In my youth," he said, "there was a joke that every man in Paris was known to the police. To-day that is universally true, and no joke with regard to every man in London. Our movements are marked, our earnings, our expenses, and our most private affairs known to the innumerable officials of the Treasury, our records of every sort, however intimate, are exactly and correctly maintained. The obtaining of work and a livelihood is dependent upon strong organisations. There is hardly an ailment or a domestic habit, from drinking wine to eating turnips, which some crank who has obtained the ear of a politician does not control or threaten in the immediate future to control."

"As for doctors!" he began, his voice cracking with indignation, "their abominable . . ." but here the old gentleman fell into so violent a fit of coughing that he nearly turned black in the face, and when I respectfully slapped him on the back, in the hopes of granting him relief, he made matters worse by shaking himself at me with an energy worthy of 1842. His nurse rushed in, clapped him upon his pillows, and was prepared to vent her wrath upon me for having caused this paroxysm, when the old man's exhaustion and laboured breathing captured all her attention, and I had the opportunity to withdraw.

PLAYS OR PAMPHLETS?*

We can quite believe that it is a good and praiseworthy thing to translate and to publish these "plays" of M. Brieux, if only because there are many people who refuse to acknowledge the existence of certain evils until these evils, or their consequences, are forcibly written down and exposed in pitiless black-and-white. The evasion of maternity, the fearful consequences of unrestrained desire, the tragedy of the wife unsuspectingly married to a man whose folly has ruined his health—these and other concomitant ills which have moved the talented French author to his present minatory mood do undoubtedly exist, although as a rule they are glossed over and treated as comparatively unimportant, except in the pages of medical essays or works devoted to pathology. That they should at times be discussed is right; the difficulty is that they are not often discussed by the right people, nor do the few—the very few—books such as the present volume fall into the right hands. Read carefully, however, by those who can eliminate the distortion apparently inseparable from all plays written with a moral purpose, the tremendous indictments of a certain phase of society—of most modern civilised societies—can but be beneficial.

On the other hand, there are definite and defensible reasons why these "Three Plays" should not be given on the stage. Take one, for instance—their lack of what we know as "art." The explosion of M. Brieux's ideas has projected at us these plays, and they are as hard, as penetrating, as unbeautiful as bullets. By sheer science they have been constructed—there is no better word; and as science constructs an article, be it weapon or loom, battleship or printing-machine, with one single end in view, sacrificing grace and beauty (and sometimes humanity) to utility, so in this volume we have the sharp, clean-cut result of a process—a process in which every thrill of beauty has been relentlessly throttled, every bud of emotion ruthlessly dissected, every upspringing flower by the wayside cruelly, calmly trodden down. Character is sacrificed to the need for emphasis; the atmosphere is that of the physician's study; graces of dialogue or conversation are ousted by the austere purpose impelling and pervading all. Rendered thus utterly inartistic by scrupulous elimination of all unnecessary matter, by impartial disregard of artistry and of intrusive, inconsequent beauty, the plays under consideration are no loss to the theatre, whatever gain they may be to the study. It would be, we imagine, almost unbearable to listen to them were they staged with ordinary care; no average audience would sit quietly through the performance. The poor Caroline—"great, stupid Caroline"—of "The Three Daughters of Monsieur Dupont" is one of the nearest approaches to humanity to be found in these pages; she hovers, oppressed and troubled by her thoughts that every now and then burst through her restraint, in the background of the play. Unloved, unwanted, her reasonings with the distracted Julie in the final Act take upon themselves an air of tragedy more impressive than the actually intended tragedy, which lies in the relationship of Julie with her husband. In "Damaged Goods" ("Les Avariés") the precision of construction reaches its height, and in "Maternity" there is very little relaxation from the strain. We are not piqued, puzzled, or amused; we are interested, somewhat as we should be interested in watching a skilful surgical operation.

There are other reasons why we think the presentation of these plays in public would do no good. It is neither necessary nor wise to flaunt the repulsive aspects of life in the face of the people; even if they flocked to see "Maternity,"

* Three Plays by Brieux: with a Preface by Bernard Shaw. English Versions by Mrs. Bernard Shaw, St. John Hankin, and John Pollock. (A. C. Fifield. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

for instance—which is inconceivable—a success of curiosity would not be worth having, as far as moral impression goes. A good deal of twisted smiling, some shruggings of shoulders and expressions of surprise—and that would be all; the play and its author would be forgotten. Men will not be preached at; and not all the appanages of a luxurious theatre could overpower the didactic effects of M. Brieux when he is riding his hobby of purifying a society which for the purposes of his play may be regarded as eternally lost to all sense of beauty and fine ideals. Fortunately we cannot quite see eye to eye with the distinguished French author in his despondent outlook. It is better to be an optimist, to cheer and help the world by laughter and hard work, than to be a pessimist engaged in the depressing task of holding up horrible bogeys to the popular gaze.

The series of little prefatory essays in which Mr. Shaw introduces M. Brieux and his play-pamphlets to whomsoever it may concern are written with all the ardour and much of the perversity with which we are bound to associate the prophet of the Gospel of Exaggeration. We have before remarked that poor old England would be a sorry place if half the things that Mr. Shaw believes about it were true. But Mr. Shaw has been so interesting that we will not pursue any farther our indictment of his method of arguing from exceptions. His remarks on "How to Write a Popular Play" are trenchant, and very true, and the paragraph entitled "The Interpreter of Life" is in his best and most brilliant style. We may quote a few sentences:—

> The great dramatist has something better to do than to amuse either himself or his audience. He has to interpret life. This sounds a mere pious phrase of literary criticism; but a moment's consideration will discover its meaning and its exactitude. Life as it appears to us in our daily experience is an unintelligible chaos of happenings. You pass Othello in the bazaar in Aleppo, Iago on the jetty in Cyprus, and Desdemona in the nave of St. Mark's in Venice without the slightest clue to their relations to one another. The man you see stepping into a chemist's shop to buy the means of committing murder or suicide may, for all you know, want nothing but a liver pill or a toothbrush. The statesman who has no other object than to make you vote for his party at the next Election may be starting you on an incline at the foot of which lies war, or revolution, or a smallpox epidemic, or five years of your lifetime. . . . Life as it occurs is senseless; a policeman may watch it and work in it for thirty years in the streets and courts of Paris without learning as much of it or from it as a child or a nun may learn from a single play by Brieux. For it is the business of Brieux to pick out the significant incidents from the chaos of daily happenings, and arrange them so that their relation to one another becomes significant, thus changing us from bewildered spectators of a monstrous confusion to men intelligently conscious of the world and its destinies.

This is well and cogently put, although the policeman referred to would, we fancy, be an uncommonly dull specimen. In another part of the Preface, however, we find Mr. Shaw subscribing to the dictum that "what we want as the basis of our plays and novels is not romance, but a really scientific natural history"! We tremble for the future of our literature and our stage if ever so appalling a prospect becomes harsh fact, but we imagine there is little danger of it—the angel of romance can occasionally win over even Mr. Shaw himself. We take leave of this remarkable volume with the feeling that it was written by a wise man who by mischance cast his ideas into the form of the play. He reaches, perhaps, a wider audience by such means, but his art suffers, and his audience, we fear, will consist largely of persons who are merely curious to hear how he puts his problems and what solutions he has to offer. Their first question will be answered easily; their second will be met with silence. WILFRID L. RANDELL.

REVIEWS

SIDELIGHTS ON NELSON AND HIS FAMILY

The Nelsons of Burnham Thorpe: Compiled from Unpublished Letters and Notebooks. By M. EYRE MATCHAM. (John Lane. 16s. net.)

WORLD-FAMOUS men, as a rule, the average man is too apt to regard in a false light. Hearing their names almost invariably associated with some deed of valour, some vivid half-hour, or some achievement that still burns with steady gleam across the dark waters of time, he imagines them superhuman, set upon a pinnacle apart from the little whims and fancies and humours which form so large a part of his own life. To him Wellington is always leading an army, Pitt is always in the maelstrom of politics, Macaulay is always writing essays, Longfellow is always immersed in poetry, George Stephenson is always driving the "Rocket" on its epoch-making journey. He does not conceive of Wellington as stooping to pat a stray dog in the street, of Pitt being measured for a suit of clothes; he fails to realise, unless forced to do so, that the hero or the celebrity does also most of the thousand trivial things that make up life for other people.

Nelson shares the same fate of standing ever in the glare of the limelight—standing always, as it were, on the deck of the Victory, and it is very pleasant to con the pages of this most interesting volume and to discover the great Admiral enjoying the quiet pleasures of a country life, sending home money for the poor folk of Burnham, and showing the man beneath the mantle of fame. When a boy he stole pears from an orchard like any other lively youngster, being lowered by sheets from the dormitory window; but he gave away all his spoil to his companions. This warm-hearted, generous disposition was continually in evidence. When the health of his father, the Rev. Edmund Nelson, made it likely that his sister Catherine—"pretty, petted, lively Kitty"—would be left homeless, he wrote that in such an event he would "immediately come to England, and most probably fix in some place that might be most for poor Kitty's advantage. My small income shall always be at her service, and she shall never want a protector and a sincere friend while I exist." Later still we have some pretty glimpses in the chapter entitled "Captain Nelson at Home:"—

> Great was the family content over the domestic plans of the Parsonage. The active captain was constantly on the move among them all. Hilborough, Barton, the Boltons at Norwich, and Maurice in London, were all drawn into closer touch by his affectionate interest in their various situations. The poorer neighbours also shared in his sympathy and help. He well knew the poverty of their lives, and tried to enlist higher powers to recognise their want. . . . In the old home itself his energies expended themselves in following up G. M.'s [George Matcham] improvements in the Parsonage grounds, and the Rector awoke to fresh interest whilst watching his son's labours and joining in new schemes.

Striking is the contrast presented when we read, in a letter of the father to Kitty, that her "Good Bro: was in very Great danger of being Captured on the 9th, when Chaced by 17 Sail of the Line for 24 Hours. . . . All his Seamanship was necessary on this occasion." Or, again, when we read Pitt's answer to General Walpole when the latter urged that a higher rank than "Baron Nelson of the Nile" should be conferred on the victor. "Admiral Nelson's fame," he said, "would be coequal with the British name; and it would be remembered that he had obtained the greatest naval victory on record, when no man would think of asking, Whether he had been created a baron, a viscount, or an earl?"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Continuous charm is given to this book by its constant exhibition of the sweetness of character of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, the gentle old man who remained at home in his tranquil rectory and followed so eagerly the fortunes and exploits of his distinguished son. His letters are full of wisdom, quaint humour, and solicitude. "My dear," he wrote to Kitty, "As you tell me that every letter of mine is kept a prisoner in the pocket till released by a Successor, it seems full time to dispatch this Act of Grace, which I should recommend to be always followed by a totall annihilation by Fire, least mischeif might arise from liberty." Fortunately, writes the author, "against her father's amused advice, Kitty kept and safeguarded them all, and her coloured satin ribbons, dainty as her little self, still tie them into separate packets." Hence we have this revelation of the old man's life and thought. He was wise in his unassuming way; let us note one of his comments:—

> Books [he writes] may amuse, but after a certain boundary reading is very unsatisfactory, and makes one often peevish when we find men of sense sometimes quarrelling about mere trifles, and discover that pride and ambition make authors, not a desire to inform others, or that by them the world should be one jott the wiser. . . . But walk forth into your fields, there Nature will meet you smiling, yeild to your will, and for one Grain, return you many a Golden Ear.

His quaint conceits are shown in a letter dated from Burnham Thorpe, January 1st, 1787:—

> . . . December has visited us in all the pomp and parade of Winter, wind and storm and rattling Hail; cloathed with frosted robes, powdered with Snow, all trimmed in Glittering Icicles; no blooming Dowager was ever finer. But she has Figured and is gone, leaving the Throne to '87, who begins with modesty and meekness, in a plain, rusty Green, with here and there the dead leaf spott. Attended only by gentle weeping Zephyrs; (all Hypocrysy I doubt).

He compares himself, in his placid way, to the "poor snail that just creeps from shrub to shrub;" the "Noisy Nonsense of Elections" disturbs him not a whit. The story goes that his morning sermon used to continue until he perceived the vestry door softly opening; this was the agreed signal given by his housekeeper—the rectory being close at hand—that "pudding time" was near, and the discourse promptly concluded.

His are not the only letters of interest, however, to which the author has had access. Mr. George Matcham, who married Catherine, is often quoted from, and reveals himself as a fine, thorough English gentleman. Towards the end of the book come hints and allusions bearing upon the fascination of Lady Hamilton for Nelson, and the trouble of the father at the threatened unhappiness.

It was well worth while to spend "certain winter evenings" among the old papers from which Mr. Matcham has made such a judicious selection, and the fifteen illustrations enhance the value of his work. Those who wish to study the characters and dispositions of a group of typical English men and women of that stirring period of our history will read every page of this volume with unqualified pleasure.

THE INDIAN POLICE

Police and Crime in India. By Sir Edmund C. Cox, Bart. (Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

Sir Edmund Cox spent thirty years in India, and rose to one of the highest positions in the police force of the Bombay Presidency, so that he writes with authority on his own subject. He has, moreover, had literary experience, and has learnt how to condense superabundant matter and bring out the salient points. He presents the case of the Indian police, its history, shortcomings, and efforts, with suggestions for improvement in a readable shape. The object of the writer is to enable the public to form its own opinion upon this much-abused department. It is obviously fair that critics should not form conclusions without hearing both sides, but critics, especially those of the Parliamentary order, are not wont to observe fairness; they get hold of enough to frame a primâ facie charge, and leave it to the Government spokesman to defend the department and the individual inculpated. But when a statesman of the calibre of Lord Courtney of Penwith shows the objections to a certain portion of Indian police procedure, there is certainly room for different views as to such points as the recording of confessions and the limitation of police detention.

The first impression produced by a perusal of this book was not that the police are hopelessly corrupt, or incapable of correction up to at least European standards, as some allege, but that an enormous amount of work was required to get rid of the vicious native system inherited on our gradual conquest of India, upon which new foundations had to be laid. Perhaps some of Sir Edmund Cox's most interesting chapters are those which describe the appalling state of the country at the commencement of British rule and the nature of the police under the old Hindu and Muhammadan Governments. The ancient village watch was part of the system of village communities in the days of emergence from barbarism; what passed for law and procedure under native government can only be regarded, according to modern ideas, as simply inhuman.

The methods employed, the tortures and beatings inflicted to extort confessions, the cruelty of the punishments, such as mutilation, trampling to death, or dragging by elephants, were simply frightful. Monstrous cruelties could be stopped at once, but even with the lapse of time it has been impossible to remove the bad name attaching to the Police Department in India. "The traditions of the force are native, and, it may be added, so are the traditional beliefs regarding it. If an ideal police could be called into existence to-morrow it would be regarded as corrupt until it had lived down its popular reputation. So it is with individuals; the honest sub-inspector is likely to be suspected only of being more astute than his dishonest colleague." Before Lord Curzon appointed the Police Commission of 1902-03, a late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal wrote forcibly:—"In no branch of the administration in Bengal is improvement so imperatively required as in the police. There is no part of our system of which such universal and bitter complaint is made, and none in which, for the relief of the people and the reputation of Government, is reform in anything like the same degree so urgently called for. The evil is essentially in the investigating staff. It is dishonest and it is tyrannical. It is essential for a real reform that there should be a bold increase in the wages of a staff which wields so great a power, and in the more careful supervision of their work."

This Commission took infinite pains in their inquiries, but the Government declined to accept their exaggerated condemnation of the whole Department, and some of their recommendations had been found unworkable. Apart from the difficulty of eradicating inveterate and ingrained abuses, improvements cost money, and only by degrees can the expenditure of a million of pounds per annum recommended by the Commission be found by the Government. Again, money cannot do everything. Though the pay of the force is increased from top to bottom and other measures are adopted to strengthen its position, there will always remain the imperfections of the Oriental character to overcome, which cannot be extirpated immediately from the whole force. Education will do something, the police training-schools will do more, promotions and rewards will have their effects; but when all is said there will remain the old Oriental feelings that power and authority are to be utilised for personal advantage, that corruption is venial and truth of no consequence, that the demerit of irregularities consists in being found out. Until "honesty is the best policy" has come to be accepted as a working principle, it cannot be said that a decent standard of morality has been attained. This is the real fundamental difficulty of establishing a satisfactory Police Department in India. The mental attitude of Orientals towards crime on the one hand, and towards methods of suppression on the other, requires thorough change. So much progress has been attained that we need not despair of further advance, but it will take time.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Meanwhile the criminal classes avail themselves of the resources of civilisation to further their nefarious ends. The world has from time to time been startled with accounts of the use of bombs and revolvers against unoffending persons, of the murders of policemen in revenge for the evidence given by them, of the efforts made to terrorise officers from the execution of their duties. But probably few people know of the facilities afforded by the railways. Apart from the wandering tribes, which practically consist of professional criminals, such as the Bhamptas, Minas, and Kaikaris, there are many thousands of Pathans in India who, entering the country across the extended Afghan border, look on the plains of India as their happy hunting-ground. Some of them lead an absolutely nomadic life. Most of them claim to be engaged in some trade or profession, adopted as a specious cloak for their malpractices. They travel enormous distances to carry out their schemes. Sir Edmund Cox mentions that they "will travel hundreds of miles by rail on their errands of crime. When challenged they are always ready with a false account of their movements, and they will give any names and addresses which happen to come into their heads."

The chapter on the Criminal Tribes is of special interest as containing curious information of circumstances entirely unknown to England. Sir Edmund Cox, however, warns the reader of forming the impression that most, if not all, offences are committed by members of the "criminal" tribes or classes. "Unfortunately, a considerable proportion of the ordinary inhabitants of every village may be termed potential if not actual criminals."

The general opinion of Sir Charles Napier is that he was a brave, fiery old soldier who took Sind; a somewhat eccentric and wilful Commander-in-Chief who tried a fall with Lord Dalhousie and got the worst of it. Sir Edmund Cox has unearthed the information that Sir Charles was the father of the modern Indian police, by introducing into Sind "an efficient police force on the principles adopted in England. The police were to be a separate force employed solely on police work." The separation of police from military duties was made universal, but while employed under the civil authorities they are drilled and have such military organisation as is necessary.

Sir Edmund Cox has much to say of police departmental details, also of the admirable penal and procedure codes of India, which the general reader will presumably skip, but policemen of all grades should study this portion as well as the whole volume. There are, perhaps, two common opinions of police work—the one that it demands the highest intelligence, the other that it is dirty work, sometimes involving unsavoury methods. The truth probably lies between these extreme views. At any rate, civilisation requires that somehow it must be done. Sir Edmund Cox deserves commendation for showing so clearly and fully how it is performed in India and its benefit to the country.

B

LIFE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Annals of a Yorkshire House, from the Papers of a Macaroni and his Kindred. By A. M. W. Stirling. Two Volumes. Illustrated. (John Lane. 32s. net.)

Those who desire an interesting picture of the lives of country gentlemen in the eighteenth century will find an admirable study in these delightful volumes. Mrs. Stirling is already known as a researcher of insight into family archives by the Life of her great-grandfather, Thomas William Coke, Earl of Leicester. In these volumes she writes of some other ancestors—the Stanhopes of Horsforth and the Spencers of Cannon Hall—more particularly of another great-grandfather, Walter Spencer Stanhope, whose father married into the family of the Spencers. We do not propose to follow the biography of Walter Stanhope, but leave that pleasant survey to the readers of the "Annals." We prefer to give some examples of the general human interest which is so deftly woven into what may be termed the literary tapestry of Mrs. Stirling's cunning work.

First, there is the picture of country life, which begins with a characteristic dispute about fishing. We all know how amazingly tenacious country squires are to-day of their rights over a small trout-stream, and the lasting quarrels between neighbours about fish. So far back as the reign of Charles II. one John Spencer, after a savage quarrel with a poor man named Dyson, who was fishing near Hoyland Swaine, ran the wretched angler through the heart with his rapier. Being a noted Cavalier, the King granted him a Royal reprieve, "which, with its Great Seal attached, is still in existence." In a later generation (c. 1740) we find the family at Cannon Hall with a ménage whose nomenclature suggests a comic pack of cards of our childhood. Yet Mrs. Stirling assures us of the fact as an undesigned coincidence. They were Mrs. Pickle, the cook; Mrs. Comfit, the housekeeper; Peach, the gardener; Fisher and Shooter, the gamekeepers; Saddler, the groom; Beat, the huntsman; Spur, the whipper-in. As might be expected, there are many accounts of sport—racing, hunting, shooting, and cock-fighting. The old kennel lists are still preserved, with the name, pedigree, and fate of each dog, showing an extraordinary number "annually ordered for execution," either on the plea of having worried sheep or in dread of madness. In the lists of the cocks used for cock-fighting the note of the fights arranged "is preceded reverently by the phrase 'Please God.'" This was but seemly, seeing that the parson was not infrequently found at the cockpit on a Sunday afternoon. Great funerals also were pompously reverent. When William Spencer died, in 1756, sixty-eight torches (one for each year of his life) were carried in procession, with the coffin covered with a black velvet pall, from a black-draped room to the black-draped church. Fox-hunting squires drank hard in those days. After one famous run twenty men drank sixty bottles of port at a convivial evening at Cannon Hall.

The details of a sojourn in London present a curious contrast to the luxury of the twentieth century. William Spencer writes to John Spencer in 1747 for his opinion "about how we must live in town"—a party of three with two servants, and expects to get lodgings for two guineas a week, and so much extra "per joynt for meat-dressing," while he should pay £8 a week for the "keeping of a pair of mares, and 10s. 6d. for the hire of a coachman." Eventually a party of seven boarded and lodged in Dorset Court, Chanel Row, Westminster, with one Mrs. Usgates, having the use of six rooms for £4 10s. a week for the whole party. We cannot imagine the daughter of a country house to-day entrusting her father with the purchase of her clothes in town, "a Camblet wth a Sattin Vest, embroidered loops in a Slight Maner, six yards and a Q^r for ye Peticoat, and fashionable black silk Cap;"—still less, concluding her letter "with proper Comp^t to Yourself and Bro^rs Hond Sir, Y^r m^t Dutifull Dau^re A. M. Spencer." An improvement in travelling from the North began in the latter half of the century, when it was announced (in 1763) that "Safe and Expeditious travelling with Machines on steel springs in four days to London could be performed from the Old King's Arms in Leeds every Monday and Wednesday." And not long after there was a notable acceleration of The Leeds Machine to two days and a half. In 1776 the time was reduced to thirty-nine hours.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are some interesting pictures in the University career of Walter Spencer Stanhope, who now becomes the central figure in the book. He writes in 1768 of "a remarkable and unprecedented thing:" how Lady Huntingdon, Queen of the Methodists, as Walpole called her, "entered eight Methodistical Mechanics at St. Edmund's Hall: and five of them (proh pudor!) Gentlemen Commoners, in sooth a barber, a grocer, a soap-boiler, a tallow chandler, and a blacksmith." Thus was Ruskin's scheme forestalled by a century, though the experiment was too advanced for the period, and did not last ten days, for "these sweet Saints with long visages did not escape Persecution, but were on Friday solemnly expelled."

When Walter Stanhope first entered on London life he found the "gilded youth" divided into two classes—the Beauties and the Macaronis. The Macaroni Club, so-called from a dish then little seen in England, was formed by young men fresh from the grand tour, who introduced the wildest gaiety of foreign fashion and gaming, much to the displeasure of the King and Queen. Stanhope soon became a prominent personage of the Macaronis, also of Almacks, and of the Society of the Dilettanti. Gaining a seat for Carlisle by the Lowther interest, he was Member of Parliament for nearly forty years. In these spheres he naturally made many acquaintances and some notable friendships among men of renown in that brilliant period, among whom were reckoned Pitt, Fox, Burke, Sheridan, and Wilberforce. He describes the famous dramatic scene, when Burke, crying excitedly "Let us go!" took several Members of the House to Westminster Abbey to search for a site for the grave of Chatham. Even before Pitt entered Parliament Stanhope predicted his future in a curious wager:—"Gave Mrs. Andrew St. John five guineas; to receive 15 guineas when Mr. William Pitt is Prime Minister;" and four years later (1784) the debt must have been honoured. The eloquence of Fox was "astonishing," but none surpassed the wonderful rhetoric of Sheridan. There is an interesting account of Wilberforce's great struggle against the powerful Whig families in Yorkshire, and of his speech to 7,000 people in York, when, as Boswell wrote, "I saw what seemed to be a mere shrimp mount upon the table, but as I listened, he grew and grew until the shrimp became a whale." In 1804 Wilberforce writes to Stanhope of the remarkable fact that, owing to the lack of timber, "18 tons of iron has just now been used in the repair of a 74 gun ship."

Mrs. Stirling is a clever and judicial biographer, possessing the gift of selection, and in these volumes throws many charming sidelights on the social and political life of the eighteenth century.

CONTEMPORARY BELGIAN POETRY

Contemporary Belgian Poetry. Selected and Translated by Jethro Bithell, M.A. (Walter Scott. 1s.)

We welcome this new volume in the cheap and convenient series known as the Canterbury Poets, if only because it re-emphasises the fact that Belgium has a very interesting and striking contemporary literature of its own, a literature written in French, but as clearly and even passionately national as that of any civilised country to-day. Modern Belgian poetry is as characteristic of the country as the work of Jordaens or Teniers, and could as little have been produced by a Frenchman. In this connection it is significant to note that all the Belgian poets of any importance are of Flemish origin. Verhaeren, Albert Giraud, Maeterlinck, and Van Lerberghe are Flemings; Max Elskamp had a Flemish father; Iwan Gilkin, who is more important as a dramatist, a Flemish mother. And though they employ the French language as their medium of expression, the emotions they seek to express are undeniably Flemish. The healthy and barbaric brutality of Verhaeren's earlier work is as much beyond the reach of a Frenchman as the mysterious, and to our mind tiresome, symbolism of Maeterlinck's songs. He is too civilised to produce the first, and he is too practical-minded to produce the second.

When we leave generalities criticism of poetry always becomes a question of individual preference. Probably every one will agree with Mr. Bithell in regarding Verhaeren, to whom this little book is dedicated, as the leading Belgian poet, but we hope that there are many who will take exception to his extravagant statement that he is the greatest of all French poets, past and present. Such a statement should always be accompanied and restricted by a definition of poetry, for, lacking that, it is difficult to know by what means the critic has arrived at his opinion. How does Mr. Bithell measure Verhaeren against Verlaine or Victor Hugo or Alfred de Musset? How do people do these things? In the same way we have always wondered by what process it has been discovered that Shakespeare is a greater poet than Keats. Is there some mysterious yard-measure of which the initiate avail themselves, or is it merely an emphatic method of stating personal prejudices and preferences? For great poetry cannot be arranged in degrees, and, once its greatness is admitted, the man who attempts the task commands our sympathy rather than our admiration. Who can say whether the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" is greater or less than the wonderful love-scene at the end of the "Merchant of Venice"? The unwarrantable use of superlatives is a defect in much modern criticism, and phrases such as the greatest poet, the greatest sculptor, the greatest painter remind us of the tallest sky-scraper, the longest sea-serpent, and the most gigantic gooseberry.

Nevertheless, we do not quarrel with Mr. Bithell for devoting sixty of his two hundred pages to the work of Verhaeren, for this is without doubt the most interesting and the most characteristically Flemish section of the book. There is no need to criticise the poet at length, for Verhaeren's work is probably better known in England than that of any other contemporary foreign poet. On the other hand, we imagine that few English readers have seriously wrestled with the lyrics of M. Maeterlinck, which leave our admiration for the poetical qualities of his prose works unaltered. A far more interesting poet is Albert Giraud, who expresses his personality in verse of a classical purity of style. He is very badly treated with only six pages, which will hardly give the reader an idea of his merit. Such a poet as Sylvain Bonmariage should not have been included at all, while personally we would also have dispensed with specimens of the work of Isi-Collin, Jean Dominique, Georges Rency, and Georges Marlow. But in justice to Mr. Bithell we should add that he has not given us much of any of these writers, and on the whole he may be said to have performed his task of selection very well.

The translation of poetry from one language to another calls either for a miracle or a crime. The miracle happens when a poet finds himself so much in sympathy with an alien confrère that he succeeds in pouring the wine of his song from one flask to another without loss or adulteration. We remember certain translations of Swinburne, of Rossetti, of Edward Fitzgerald, and we know that the feat is possible. But almost invariably the translator of poetry is compelled to choose one of two criminal alternatives. He must either sacrifice fidelity to the original to the exigencies of a new medium of expression, or be content to produce a faithful version from which all the poetical qualities of the original are absent. Mr. Bithell has compromised by sinning in both directions. For instance, there is nothing in the poetical merit of this—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I know full well to-day, my dream was mad;
My love of autumn was a crime, no doubt;
And like a nail I tear the yearning out
That my too simple heart for childhood had—to justify it as a translation of:—

Je comprends aujourd'hui que mon rêve était fou,
Que mon amour d'automne était presque une offense,
Et j'arrache à jamais de mon cœur, comme un clou,
Le tragique désir d'une impossible enfance.

This will serve as a compendious example of the liberties that Mr. Bithell takes with his text. He has changed the metre and the order of the rhyme-endings; he has translated presque in the second line by "no doubt;" he has not translated à jamais in the third line or impossible in the fourth at all, and to fill up he has attached an epithet of his own to the word "heart." Allowing himself such a freedom as this, we cannot but feel that he should have produced better results poetically.

But, in spite of this, we think that this little book will serve its purpose very well in giving English readers who cannot read French verse an opportunity of realising certain aspects of contemporary Belgian poetry. A literal prose translation accompanied by the original text is, in our opinion, always more satisfactory. But doubtless that lies outside the scheme of the present series. And when we consider the difficulty of giving anything like an adequate version of the work of twenty different poets, we realise that it is unjust to apply too high a standard to Mr. Bithell's renderings.

We must end with a word of caution. Flemish art is outspoken, and, as Mr. Bithell has sensibly and courageously published his translations without expurgation, this is emphatically not a book for the young. Indeed, when we recall the outcry that was raised against Swinburne's relatively innocuous "Poems and Ballads," we wonder what Robert Buchanan and his blushing comrades would have made of such a book as this. But as a rule the bluntness of the Belgian poets may be taken to be a sign of barbaric healthiness of mind rather than of any unwholesome absorption in the sexual. At the same time, if this book had been the original work of an English poet it would never have found a publisher. R. M.

THE AGONISTS

The Agonists: a Trilogy of God and Man. By Maurice Hewlett. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

A critic with a poem before him strange as to manner and uncommon as to its substance has always a difficult task to achieve the perfect balance between an eagerly receptive mind and a clear reliance on certain ineradicable principles. For there are such principles. There is a class of stolid unwieldy minds for which To-day expresses the utmost possible summit of achievement, and to which all things new wear the clear brand of the pit. With that, of course, no sane mind has any sympathy. We must go on: if we cannot progress, we must discover things new; if we cannot discover things that are new, then we must express the old things with the new charm of hot life, which is in itself a manner of discovery. But there is another class of mind: and it is very much the rule with a certain type among modern literary critics. The exploits of this class of mind are very interesting. Put before it a poem cast from pure gold, but fashioned in old-time Spenserian stanzas, and the chances are that it will not even be read. But put before it some shapeless mass of versicles, and something very like ecstasy will ensue. A poem that expresses man's perennial love for woman it will put by with a gesture of scorn; but a poem that deals with a sporadic, if not a coxcomb's, hatred of woman it will hail as a sign of strength—whereas it will probably be the outcome of an irritation that is the very essence of weakness.

So in approaching Mr. Hewlett's poem it becomes absolutely necessary to have certain fundamental principles clearly in mind. For instance, it is the business of poetry to express beauty. Whether that beauty be its own sufficiency, as some say, or whether it be the most exquisite concomitant of a higher morality, as others will say, does not very much matter at the moment. The main thing is that beauty, and not ugliness, is the goal, or, to put it in terms of the reading mind, the thing to be stirred in us should be exaltation and not revulsion, ecstasy and not distaste. So much for the substance of poetry. As for the manner of its expression, there are broad rules here too, not less unfailing. For the whole course of poetry is the history of the attempt to articulate beauty in an eternal, universal rhythm—such as the planets swing to, such as guides the stars and dominates our own minds and emotions. That rhythm admits of diversity; it even demands diversity, since without it the monotony is intolerable. But it is a diversity of the rhythm and not a defiance of it. Or, to phrase it in the terms of our own literature, we say that Norton and Sackville were incompetent because the thump and stump of the iambic metre in Gordobuc hypnotised them (and wearied us), and we say that Occleve was incompetent because his lines have not the wildest suggestion of rhythm. We go to sleep over the one, and we could "hurl things" at the other. The finest example of an artist who can keep ever true to his dominating rhythm, and yet ever keep shifting his weights and marshalling his metrical legions, is, of course, Milton.

Therefore when we find Mr. Hewlett saying in his preface that "surely poetry may borrow from prose without ceasing to be poetry," it gives us pause. As a point of fact (and it would be a good thing if this were more clearly recognised in certain quarters to-day) poetry and prose, or, rather, metrical and unmetrical expression, are so distinct that a true artist has actually to conceive the thing he would say in one or the other form. Mr. Hewlett goes on to say that "the burden of the iambic pentameter has been too many for the poets—and, it seems, for their readers." Well, if it was one too many for the "poets," it would very naturally be one too many for their readers. That goes without saying. But it is by no means so clear that in overcoming feeble poets the iambic pentameter did not prove its own heroic qualities. Long before Milton appeared on the scene it proved one too many for poor Occleve, but that does not prove Occleve right and the iambic pentameter at fault. Read the following passage from Mr. Hewlett's present work, and judge whether it or the much-despised iambic pentameter is more apt to stupefy the reader.

Britomart's ghost, querulous,
Men say, still flits about
The precinct where her heart
Was fixt, and in the night
Her prayers sob round the aisles.
So the haplessly dead,
Pluckt too soon from the earth,
Haunt it still, living
Unsubstantially there!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It simply is not rhythm of any kind, and to print it as poetry is to beg the whole question Printed as prose it would defy reconstruction, and the ear aches with the effort to hear a rhythm that is not there, and the mind is irritated beyond measure. The attention instead of being assisted, as is the business of metre, is destroyed; and the mind, instead of being charmed by a richness of music, is puzzled by cacophony. This is not a question of novelty; it is simply a question of laws that dominate all things, from Sirius with his dark companion to the emotions in our own bosoms—laws which Mr. Hewlett, either in weakness or in unhealthiness, has defied, and which have therefore broken him. It is too late in the day to make a new universe. Creation is not mere novelty; it is discovery. Even at its best Mr. Hewlett's verse, by irritating the expectation, proves that the fundamental laws of the mind are being violated. The mind floats on such a passage as the following with an extraordinary feeling of rest:

> O steadfast and sure, O holy,
> O grey-eyed Maiden far-seeing,
> O lovely as light on the hills,
> O kind as the sun on the hill-tops!
> O clear and pure, to whose beam
> Is given to cleave things hid
> In men's dark souls—lift now
> The shroud of pain from our heads!

Then we realise that it is the equable rhythm that has given our expectation its ease.

Inasmuch as we can only know a poem by its appearance, it has seemed wise to deal first with the somewhat repelling shape Mr. Hewlett has seen fit to give his Trilogy. Yet, when one approaches the matter and substance of it, one finds a similar repulsion there. We may be forgiven the thought that it is surely time we outgrew the myths of two and a half millenniums ago. Not only do they fail absolutely to express our conceptions, but they strike us as very puerile for the most part—always excepting the beautiful myth of Demeter and Persephone. Even its tales are far remote from us: the great story of Oedipus, for example, with its clockwork cynicism of the gods, having to overcome an undesirable resistance before attention can be won. Yet even if a poet elect to be so far recessive at this time of day as to go back to the Greek tales, worked through so often as they have been, there are still many of them that make a sufficiently desirable proffer without choosing so repulsive a story. This whole Trilogy is based on the sin of Pasiphaë; that is to say, on a thing that is horrible. If, as has been said, it is the business of poetry to express beauty, then Mr. Hewlett has stumbled at the very threshold of the matter by expressing something that is ugly and revolting. No ethic teaching can be drawn from Pasiphaë's sin, because it is outside human, or, at least, legitimate experience. Her sin, and the death of Minos' son, is the burthen of the first of the Trilogy. In his Introduction Mr. Hewlett tells us that Power, Love, and Knowledge being the essential qualities of God, and therefore of Man when likest God, each unit of the Trilogy has as its business to expose the failure of God or man from the lack of one or other of these essential qualities. Minos, for example, fails because although he had knowledge he had not power. Incidentally he seems to show a singular lack of knowledge. Perhaps he had it, however, but was not given an opportunity of showing it. But exactly wherein he shows his lack of power, seeing he was broken through his wife's monstrous sin, does not appear.

The next unit deals with Ariadne in Naxos; and through it all there is a subtler unhealthiness, though it is not less undesirable. It purports to show that the god Dionysus has power, but not the faculty, of winning love. Truly enough the structure of the story conveys it, but it is not brought home to us. The adultery of Ariadne with Dionysus is so arbitrary, so mechanical, that the mind calls out against it. Let the matter be put clearly. When Macbeth commits his murder, were his evil twice as great as it is, the story of his deed twines about us, for he is one of us. He acts from a propulsion that we can understand, however we may condemn it. Therefore his story need make no effort to convey a moral, for in the deepest sense it is in itself a moral. It moves on the plane of our understanding. The evils he may do may be great, may be heinous, but they are not monstrous. But when Ariadne is led away by Dionysus, or when Theseus is sent away by Dionysus, it is not Ariadne nor Theseus nor Dionysus who acts, it is a harsh, arbitrary, ugly old story that pushes them about. Like the incoherence of the verse, it irritates us and violates our sense of fitness. The mind objects to being irritated and harrowed simply to please the undesirable caprice of an unlikely old legend. Mr. Hewlett tells us that poets have hitherto avoided this cycle of legends. That in itself should have made him suspicious of them.

All this is a pity. Lofty endeavours are not so numerous nowadays that we can look on a ruin of this kind unmoved. Poems that aim as high as this cycle aims are urgent to be done. But when we see a poem like this fail, both in matter and manner, we may be forgiven the thought that its maker has scarcely the equipment for their achievement.

HENRY VIII.'S PERSONALITY

Henry VIII. and his Court. By Herbert Beerbohm Tree. With Four Full-page Plates. Sixth Edition. (Cassell and Co. 1s. net.)

We have received the sixth edition of Sir Herbert Tree's notes on "Henry VIII. and his Court." The little work is only intended as a useful commentary upon the stage production of Shakespeare's play. Sir Herbert Tree writes: "Henry was every inch a man, but he was no gentleman," and he proceeds to support this view by giving the family history of the Tudors, who were a Welsh family of somewhat humble stock. "Henry VII.'s great-grandfather was butler or steward to the Bishop of Bangor, whose son, Owen Tudor, coming to London, obtained a Clerkship of the Wardrobe to Henry V.'s Queen, Catherine of France." A morganatic marriage took place, the two sons of it, Edmund and Jasper, were favoured by their half-brother, Henry VI.: Edmund became Earl of Richmond, and, in 1543, was formally declared legitimate and enrolled a member of the King's Council. Two years later he married the Lady Margaret Beaufort, a descendant of Edward III. It was this union between Edmund Tudor and Margaret Beaufort which gave Henry VII. his claim by descent to the English Throne.

A chronicler who saw Henry VIII. at the Field of the Cloth of Gold describes him in a somewhat different manner to that which Sir Herbert Tree has put forward:—

> The goodliest prince that ever reigned over the realm of England, honnete, hault et droit, in manner gentle and gracious, rather fat with a red beard, large enough, and very becoming.

If the chronicler is to be believed, there is no reason to attribute to Henry coarse or ungentlemanly behaviour, and therefore the actor who represents the Tudor monarch must choose between the statement that Henry was no gentleman and the description which we have just quoted, and which would certainly lead one to suppose that in his manners at least he was one. At any rate, we cannot conceive that Henry's musical ability could possibly be the attribute of a boorish person. We are told that he "played with taste and execution on the organ, harpsichord, and lute;" also that he had "a powerful voice, and sang with great accomplishment." He had many other accomplishments, amongst which we may mention that he was a practical architect. On the whole we think that he was an accomplished man, and that he should be portrayed on the stage in that light.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are many smart epigrammatic phrases in the book. We note that "To-day the pen is mightier than the sword; the stylograph is more deadly than the stiletto."

The little volume goes on to trace with accuracy Wolsey's magnificence:—

> His gold and silver plate at Hampton Court alone was valued by the Venetian Ambassador at 300,000 golden ducats, which would be the equivalent in modern coin of a million and a half. The silver was estimated at a similar amount.

Perhaps it would have been better if Wolsey had restricted his prodigality, bearing in mind that his royal master had a very keen eye to the magnificent as well as an unerring instinct to convert it to his own use. Thus we find the King asking of Wolsey:

> Why he, a subject, should have so magnificent an abode as Hampton Court; whereupon Wolsey diplomatically answered (feeling perhaps the twitch of a phantom rope around his neck), "To show how noble a place a subject may offer to his Sovereign." The King was not slow to accept this offer, and thenceforth made Hampton Court Palace his own.

The fall of Wolsey proceeded apace henceforward, and followed very closely on the lines of Shakespeare's play.

Sir Herbert Tree treats with considerable skill the intrigues and transactions which led to the Reformation, the whole raison d'être of which was whether the King could obtain a divorce from Queen Katharine in order to make Anne Boleyn his Queen. Of course these facts are well known to the historian, the main idea of the present work being to bring them together in a very concise and convenient manner, and the little book may well be recommended to those who during a half-hour like to be transported into a past of magnificence and great interest.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Imperial Telegraphic Communication. By CHARLES BRIGHT. (P. S. King and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. BRIGHT has gathered together in this small volume a number of papers, addresses, and articles contributed by him at various times to learned societies and monthly reviews upon the urgent need of the extension and cheapening of the cable system throughout the British Empire. This is one of the problems which is engaging the earnest attention of the Colonial Premiers at present visiting England—a problem the importance of which, in connection with Imperial unity, it is impossible to overestimate. The effective control and protection of our cable connections in time of war is as important as the efficiency of our fighting forces themselves. It is true that "wireless" has already proved a valuable auxiliary, but as matters stand its radius of activity is limited, and it would be a colossal error for any Government to await its perfection instead of using the materials already at hand in order to strengthen strategically the position of the Empire as an entity. When it is remembered that the cost of a first-class battleship is approximately twice that of an Atlantic cable, it seems scarcely credible that there is no British-owned cable between Canada and the British Isles. In fact, all indications point to the pooling of the existing Atlantic cable systems into one huge American combine, which would probably lead to a raising of rates, and might even be used as a means of checking trade between Great Britain and the Dominion.

But apart from the Atlantic connections, the position of the cables linking up the Mother Country with the more distant colonies is equally unsatisfactory. With the exception of the trans-Pacific cable between Australia and Canada, all the other lines pass through some portion of foreign territory, and are thus liable to interruption at any moment. There can be no guarantee against their being interfered with in the event of international complications, a sufficiently serious position of affairs considering the necessity, at all costs, of protecting the outlying portions of the Empire. In addition to the strategic side of the question, however, is the factor that lack of mutual understanding generally lies at the root of most Imperial difficulties. It is quite impossible to gauge accurately the legitimacy or justice of some grievance without being thoroughly conversant with the local conditions and the trend of popular feeling. No doubt the responsible officials are kept well informed, but even so it is the great mass of the general public which is indirectly responsible for a definite line of policy. Cheaper cable rates would mean increased communication of all kinds, leading up by degrees to mutual understanding and sympathy. The case of England and France is an excellent example of how public feeling can be swayed by closer acquaintanceship. Not so long ago France was regarded with deep suspicion as a species of hereditary enemy; but travel became easier and cheaper, visits were more frequently paid from the one country to the other and vice versa, with the result that distrust rapidly merged into sincere friendship. An all-red cable route linking up the distant portions of the Empire could not but prove an invaluable asset in strengthening the bonds of sympathy and understanding, upon which the whole structure of the Imperial ideal rests.

Nouveaux Récits des Temps Révolutionnaires. By ERNEST DAUDET. (Hachette and Co. 3f. 50c.)

SURELY it is time for M. Ernest Daudet to call a halt. He has been writing for more than fifty years, during which time his output has been enormous. It is seriously a question whether several of his later works deserved to be printed, at any rate in volume form. Never was there a more scrappy book than the one before us. We agree with M. Daudet that, although one may fix the date at which the French Revolutionary Period began, it is difficult to say when it ended (if, indeed, it has ended now), in such wise that one may perhaps be allowed to include in it matters pertaining both to the First Empire and to the Bourbon Restoration. But this olla podrida of M. Daudet's contains nothing of value and little of real interest. An account of the Empress Elizabeth, consort of Alexander I. of Russia, which is merely a kind of précis of a three-volume work issued by the Grand Duke Nicholas Michaelovitch; a few inconclusive particulars of a fraud of the "Spanish prisoner type; a reprint of the fragmentary story of an adventuress named Adélaïde Riflon, who duped sundry personages of the First Republic and the Consulate; a narrative of the case of the Chevalier de Gonault, who was shot at Troyes in 1814 for "treason" to Napoleon; a few glimpses of Louis XVIII. and his unworthy nephew the Duc de Berry; and a gossipy sketch of life at Aix-la-Chapelle during the Congress of 1818—such are the contents of M. Daudet's volume. The last paper, which is chiefly based on French police reports, is by far the best of the bunch, as it affords entertaining glimpses of the Russian and Austrian Emperors, Metternich, Wellington, and others, including Lady Castlereagh, who is shown dancing nimbly and incessantly with one or another crowned head, though she is described as a person of most colossal proportions, whose diamond-decked hair is surmounted by three long feathers (in fact, a Prince of Wales' crest) "rising perpendicularly towards heaven." There is also in this same paper some amusing information about the many bas bleus, vocalists, lady-aeronauts, and fortune-tellers who flocked to Aix in 1818; but in the rest of M. Daudet's volume we find little that is really new to us.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A Woman of the Revolution: Théroigne de Méricourt. By FRANK HAMEL. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

THE question which presents itself on examining this handsome volume is whether it was really worth while to expend so much time, trouble, ink, and paper on the biography of such a creature as Anne-Josèphe Terwagne, otherwise Théroigne de Méricourt. Mr. Frank Hamel has written previously, and wrttten well, on the Dauphines of France and Mme. du Châtelet, and those biographies were fitting themes for his skilful pen; but is it not excessive to devote a volume of nearly 400 pages to the career of a woman whom one may describe without hesitation as a harlot and a liar, and whose influence on the Revolution was brief, intermittent, and far less important than the legendary accounts of her (popularised in this country by Carlyle) would have us to believe? If a bulky octavo volume is to be allotted to a third or fourth rate character of the Revolution, we may have to revert to folios when we are dealing with the chief personages of that period. In our opinion, moreover, there is nothing attractive in the story of Théroigne's life. She is in no sense sympathique. Doubtless she was less guilty than some have asserted. Mr. Hamel shows that a good many lies have been told or written about her; but his book also contains proof that she told or wrote a good many lies herself. Her kindness to her brothers, who did not scruple to take from her money she derived from her protectors, is adduced as a proof of her "noble" nature; but many similar examples might be adduced among women of her character. She is also described as being very attractive in appearance, if not exactly beautiful. It is difficult to decide, however, which of the portraits of her given in this volume is the least ugly. Possibly it is the one serving as a frontispiece, for in this she merely looks anæmical.

Our criticism of Mr. Hamel's book is levelled solely at its subject, for we gladly acknowledge that he is a very careful and well-informed writer. We trust that he will select for his next work a more reputable and attractive heroine than the so-called "brown beauty," over whom Carlyle contrived to wax sentimentally eloquent, but who leaves us profoundly cold.

THE Illustrated London News is described on its title-page as a "Coronation Record Number," and, from a somewhat cursory glance through the many charming pages which go to make up this souvenir edition, it would appear that the appellation is well merited. There are twenty-four coloured and other plates, many illustrations, and portraits. The frontispiece consists of the reproduction of a special painting of King George expressly designed for the Illustrated London News by Mr. C. Ouless. Other pictures include an excellent likeness of Queen Mary, after the painting by Mr. G. C. Wilmshurst; one of Edward, Prince of Wales, after Mr. S. Begg; illustrations of representatives of the King's "Own" Regiments of the Indian Army, and photographs of the Regalia to be used at the Coronation. There are also several pages devoted to the illustration of some very interesting legendary fantasies, such as "The Legend of the Egyptian Origin of the Stone of Scone," "The Fisherman's Vision," and "The Virgin Appearing to Thomas à Becket."

In such a number as this the reading-matter naturally takes a secondary place, although a very large amount of interesting information is given with reference to the many and varied matters in connection with the coming ceremony. The very handsome borders surrounding the illustrations must not be passed by without a word of comment. We think that it is no exaggeration to say that these constitute some of the most artistic portions of the "Record Number." The designs are most beautiful and dainty, while the colours are made to blend in a manner only possible to any one who has a very keen appreciation of the beautiful. No one who spends half-a-crown on The Illustrated London News Coronation Number can possibly be disappointed in his purchase.

FICTION

The Ship of Coral. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

MR. STACPOOLE'S latest novel may be bracketed with "The Blue Lagoon" for several reasons. It is a return to his best manner—the real, adventurous, vivid story-telling manner which holds any reader but a misanthrope charmed until the last page is finished. Gaspard Cadillac and a shipmate, Yves, are wrecked on an outer island of the West Indies, sole survivors. Yves, wandering at the edge of the lagoon, discovers the wonderful sunken vessel encrusted with coral, gleaming with a thousand hues, which is the theme of the book, and the story of Gaspard's unfortunate quarrel with Yves, of his meeting with the extraordinary Captain Sagesse of Saint Pierre, and of their subsequent adventures in search of treasure, forms a romance quite as enthralling as any Mr. Stacpoole has previously given us. Running through it all we have a delicate little love-episode, which ends happily, although the climax is reached among the ruins of the city which Pelée's awful eruption wellnigh erased from the map.

None of Mr. Stacpoole's skill in description has deserted him; he makes his readers see the wonderful tropical dawns and sunsets. Here is a word-picture difficult to excel:—

> The world now seemed dipped in the cup of a great golden flower, and the little ripples that came sighing in round the low-tide reefs showed their foam like fleeces of gold. Not a trace of cloud showed in the golden sky, not a wave on the golden sea; in that wonderful sunset the palm-tops burned like fingers of flame, and, as music lights the soul of man, so did the golden and glowing atmosphere the heart of the lagoon.
>
> The ship in the water below answered to the magic of the light; the thing that had been grey and dismal as death was in a moment transformed to a dream of colour; the grains of frost-white coral became golden lamps; starfish, sea-flowers, coralline growths, pink, crimson, indigo, pale yellow—colour and form, all lent their adornment. Shadowless on her bed of dazzling sand, she hung for a moment burning in full sight, clear to the eye as though she were floating in air, and exquisite as a jewel; then, just as she had bloomed she faded out, her colour and beauty passing with the fading light; and as night swept over the sea like the shadow of a violet wing, she vanished utterly, whilst the lagoon filled with darkness, and the first stars cast their shimmer on its surface.

Such vivid colour is the note of this fascinating story, and if we cannot set sail for these isles of light and beauty, the next best thing is to read of them in Mr. Stacpoole's delightful romances.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Major's Niece. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

HERE is a capital book, with many a laugh in it. There are not so many books written at the present time that compel laughter as to put this one in danger of being overlooked. Mr. Birmingham has made a "corner" in this kind of natural, spontaneous, mirth-provoking Irish tale, and in "J. J." he has a real character, a character that made the success of "Spanish Gold" and will sustain this. Major Kent receives a letter from his sister living in Australia, where her husband rears sheep, while she rears a big family, the size of which is loosely defined by being called the convenient number of ten. It may be more or less, her brother thinks; but it is some good round number, and he cannot be exact about it. In the letter his sister says that she is on a trip to Europe, and she proposes to send her daughter Marjorie to stay with her uncle what time she and her husband "do" the European capitals. The Major is a bachelor, devoted to the breeding of ponies and to his yacht. His house, called "Portsmouth Lodge," is unique in the district by reason of the fact that the Major has raised up a thoroughly tidy Irish housekeeper, only, however, to fall into deep subjection to her. His domestic requirements are further arranged for in the shape of a maid called Mary Garry, a man to look after his horses called Jamesey Deneril, and a boy engaged to do odd jobs called Pandeen Canavan, which he either does or does not, according to the proximity of the strap. It is into this house that a niece is to be shot from Australia, and in his anxiety to know how best to meet so desperate a situation, the Major calls in the advice of his friend the Rev. J. J. Weldon, who is the curate of Ballymoy, and called by his friend "J. J."

After reading the letter "J. J." assures the Major, from internal evidence, that she is a grown-up young lady, and draws up an elaborate programme, including tennis parties, At Homes, cycling (a new machine is bought for her at the instigation of "J. J."), and other innocent diversions for a charming young lady just entering into the world. The story of her beauty and her talents is set abroad quite innocently by "J. J.," and the whole countryside is looking forward to her arrival. At last the day of her arrival is reached, and the Major and "J. J." set off to meet, at the distant station, the grown-up young lady whose coming has excited so much calculation. Marjorie is met, and Marjorie is ten years old. The fun and frolic of the child, the blarney of "J. J." who carries off every situation in triumph, make capital reading. This is a book for the idle-born, and makes idleness profitable unto health.

The Valley of Regret. By ADELAIDE HOLT. (John Lane. 6s.)

THE name of the author of "The Valley of Regret" is new to us. The consequent inference is, therefore, that it is her first book. If this is the case Miss Adelaide Holt is to be congratulated on the triumphant success which it will undoubtedly make. It is a masterpiece of characterisation, style, construction—of everything, in short, that constitutes the art of novel-writing. The lapses, faults, and jarring clichés which almost invariably escape the blue pencil in the vast majority of first novels are non-existent in "The Valley of Regret." Miss Adelaide Holt's characterisation does not consist of the long-winded, over-elaborate, and wholly tiresome stuff which most authors seem to consider good writing. She has sketched in her characters with light, delicate touches which are peculiar to a master craftsman. Betty, John, Edward, the German Jew—without exception, all her characters are strikingly alive. Everything that they do and say, one feels instinctively, was done and said by them. It would be impossible for them to have acted or spoken differently. The tragedy of Edward—which is not half so awful as the tragedy of Betty or of John—is worked out step by step with consummate skill, the last scene being one of almost painful drama and reality. The pictures of slum life, with Father Ben, John, and Betty as their centre, are beautifully told. The writer does skate lightly and easily over the surface of things. She holds up their souls for our inspection. "The Valley of Regret" is one of the best novels of the year, and we shall look forward with keen interest to all Miss Adelaide Holt's subsequent work.

THE THEATRE

"HEDDA GABLER" AT THE KINGSWAY

IN his own grim manner Ibsen answered the protest of his opponents, embodied in the words of Judge Brack, "People don't do such things," by writing "Hedda Gabler," and incidentally giving the principal part a difficulty, a mysterious emotional appeal, which few actresses can grapple with successfully. Hedda is Ibsen's inevitable revolutionist; or, to put it more poetically, his inevitable symbolic bird of freedom—angrily, fruitlessly, hopelessly beating its wings against the bars of its cage. Like Ellida, in "The Lady from the Sea," she cannot breathe in the strange atmosphere of her new home; but, unlike Ellida, her solution of the problem ends in cloud, storm, and oblivion instead of sunshine and peace. "I, at any rate," wrote Ibsen in a letter to Georg Brandes, "shall never be able to join a party which has the majority on its side. Bjornson says, 'The majority is always right;' and as a practical politician he is bound, I suppose, to say so. I, on the contrary, of necessity say, 'The minority is always right.'" Flying in the face of conventions, he investigated the result of revolt, and of that peculiar, unsatisfactory sort of courage which comes from nerves strung up to the breaking-point; and we, to-day, watch the cruel struggles of his imprisoned, rebellious souls with a curious kind of interest—half fascinated, half repelled; the echoes of the acclamations and derisions of the 'eighties still ring in our ears, mingled with the sense that these studies in psychology are even now not out of date, not without their meaning.

Madame Yavorska finds in Hedda a character peculiarly suited to the wonderful acting with which she has surprised those who have seen her. She is, perhaps, a trifle too sinuous, too provocative (for lack of a better word), for the Hedda of the play, but there can be no doubt that she interprets the part thoroughly. Some critics might say that she interprets it too thoroughly, since into her slightest sentences she throws a vivid emphasis, an almost strenuous significance; but this is partly the result of her thrilling voice and its exotic accent. In the scene where she tears up the manuscript of Lovborg's book she was superb; her passion of mingled emotions was fierce, seeming to carry her away. She is full of gesture and movement, yet always exquisitely graceful; but at times, without a motion, still and tragic, she can convey a whole mood of fear, loneliness, and revulsion. With her excellent performance must be coupled the fine exposition of Mr. Franklin Dyall as Judge Brack. He was restrained without being stiff, intense without the slightest approach to melodrama; the finest moments of the play, from an artistic point of view, came when he and Madame Yavorska occupied the stage together.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was a pity that Mr. F. Kinsey Peile took the part of George Tesman too broadly. By acting it so freely in a low-comedy manner, and by a rather too comic make-up, he rendered it inconceivable that Hedda, as portrayed by Madame Yavorska, should have married him for any reason whatsoever. His recurrent exclamation, "Fancy that, Hedda!" was delivered in a manner which became irritating; indeed, we imagine it would be to the advantage of the play to cut a good many "Fancy thats" out completely, for they simply made certain members of the audience laugh when no laughter was intended or needed. Mr. Lewis Willoughby as Eilert Lovborg, again, would have gained by a less emphatic rendering of his lines; he was too tigerish in his love-making, if the reminiscent moments with Hedda Tesman can so be called. On the other hand, in his more quiet appearances he proved himself very capable. Miss Helen Haye improved as she went on in the part of Mrs. Elvsted; Miss Florence Haydon as the aunt, Juliana Tesman, knew and gave precisely the value of her part; and the servant was well rendered by Miss Jean Bloomfield, who ought some day to be seen in an Ibsen play which should give her more scope.

Much applause and many flowers were the portion of the Princess throughout and at the conclusion of the play, and once more we must congratulate her on a success in which a vivid personality is enforced by remarkable histrionic powers.

"THE CHERRY ORCHARD" AT THE ALDWYCH THEATRE

On Tuesday afternoon the Incorporated Stage Society produced the above comedy in four Acts, translated from the Russian of Anton Tchehov by Mrs. Edward Garnett, before a large but not enthusiastic audience. No blame can be attached to the audience for its lack of enthusiasm, for although the actors and actresses concerned were perfect in their parts, and excellent in their interpretations, the prevailing idea must have been wonder,—wonder at what it was all about. The characters, to an English mind, express very little. They saunter on the stage, make observations which seem to have little to do with the piece, and utter small jokes which hardly raise a smile and altogether fail to justify their existence. As a picture of Russian manners and society such a production may have its value; it cannot, however, be called a play, since there is no dramatic progression, nor, for English hearers, is there anything to grip the attention. Miss Katharine Pole, Mr. Franklin Dyall, Mr. Harcourt Williams, to mention but three members of a lengthy cast, did their best with the unpromising material at their disposal; but the Stage Society has a weary task before it if it hopes to educate us up to an appreciation of plays which by their nature cannot signify much to a public brought up under totally different conditions from those portrayed.

"THE ONLY WAY" AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE

"The Only Way," like "The Broken Melody," is a perennial. Men may come and men may go, but these go on for ever. We saw "The Only Way" when Mr. Martin Harvey first produced it and sprang from general utility to a leading man. Having served a long apprenticeship with Sir Henry Irving at the old Lyceum Theatre, where he played innumerable small parts, and where he was likely to remain as merely Mr. Harvey, the production of Mr. Freeman Wills' adaptation of Charles Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities" was apparently his only way to fame and fortune. We have never seen this play since its memorable first night, many years ago. We were vastly interested in seeing not only how it wore, but how Mr. Harvey had survived the monotony of so many performances.

As a piece of dramatic work it is not a very great effort. Its construction is rather feeble, its dialogue old-fashioned and high-flown. It requires a man with great gifts, of a very winning personality, to carry it through with any success. We were glad to find Mr. Martin Harvey much freer of the actor's tricks than we had expected. It is true that he no longer brings into the earlier Acts the variety of notes which he used to employ. We found him all too sad and sweet and, if we may say so, sickly. But in the tribunal scene his work showed a great improvement, and of course his almost ethereal manner was very useful in the last Act and in the tableau. We think that he now overdoes that curious out-of-tune intonation which has been so greatly imitated with such fatal effects, and his slowness rather induces somnolence. But the popular Lyceum audience greedily accepts Mr. Harvey's air of inspiration. He certainly has what is known in theatrical parlance as ecstasy. No man ever gave up his life for love's sake so splendidly or so self-consciously. Mr. Harvey even makes the over-indulgence in the drinking of port wine saintly, and he cracks the few jokes with which he is provided with the air of an archangel. He is indeed altogether angelic.

We found, however, in the general representation of the play a rather unfortunate reproduction of Mr. Harvey's methods, mannerisms, and vocal effects in all the other leading parts. This was especially noticeable in the actor who appeared as Charles Darnay, son of the Marquis de St. Evremonde, and the actress who took the part of Lucie Manette. The love scene between these two in the country garden of a house in Soho was a very amazing thing. It was almost operatic. Mr. Cowley Wright and Miss Brenda Gibson sang to each other, and while doing so put themselves in all the stereotyped attitudes of grand opera. We momentarily expected them to break into a duet. We suppose, however, that it is the only way in which such a scene can be treated. The words they had to speak were exactly those of the drawing-room ballad.

In the part of the faithful Mimi Miss N. de Silva played so confidentially that we rarely heard any of her lines. Perhaps this was as well. It had the effect of keeping us awake and putting us into an acrostic mood. It provided us with so much that we had to guess. Apart from this Miss de Silva's performance seemed to be a very charming one. Mr. Charles Glenney, as the villainous Defarge, left nothing to the imagination. He was unutterably villainous, and whenever he was on the play took a very welcome speed. Mr. Glenney is an actor of the old school and is no believer in the supersubtle. His performance was a very robust one. The same criticism may be applied with equal cordiality to all the actors and actresses who howled and shouted, screamed and waved their arms in the famous Act—sans-coulettes as they were called on the programme. Incidentally, it will be seen that the producers of this play are a little shaky in their French. So are the actors, who give more than the usual number of stage pronunciations of the word monsieur. When dealing with the name of St. Evremonde they make it easily understandable to every one who does not live in Soho. These are, however, the merest quibbles. The fact remains that "The Only Way" has justified itself. We may quarrel with its construction, writhe under its bombast, and watch with awe and wonder some of its acting. All the same its story goes straight to the great heart of the public, and for the reason that it holds self-sacrifice, honest love, and all the other splendid things of life up to admiration, it well deserves to continue in its successful career for many years to come. Mr. Martin Harvey has in his time strutted the stage in far more ambitious parts; he has played Hamlet and Richard III. and Pelleas; but when he says in his inimitable way, as he stands beneath the guillotine, "It is a far, far better thing that I do than I have ever done," he speaks truly. As Sydney Carton he plays a part which fits him like a glove, and there is nothing in his acting of it which has anything of the unintentional comicality which was noticed in his Hamlet and in his Richard III.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MISS ELLEN TERRY AT THE HAYMARKET

On Thursday, May 25th, at the Haymarket Theatre, Miss Ellen Terry gave a discourse on "Some Shakespearean Heroines," with illustrative acting. Introducing her subject, she commented upon the dangers of approaching Shakespeare's plays with preconceived ideas, or of endeavouring to make each particular play fit with a particular theory; Shakespeare was as changeful and fluid as life itself. It was out of the question to include all his heroines, even in the most superficial way, in a short appreciation; the most natural division, when considering his principal women characters, was between the triumphant heroines of his comedies and those condemned by character or history to a tragic destiny.

Beginning with Viola, Miss Terry observed that into Viola's mouth Shakespeare has put some of the most incomparable words of love that even he, master of love's expression, could find. Even his less developed heroines have plenty of character. Desdemona, for example, was no simpleton, but possessed a very strong personality, and many actresses failed to realise the part in the least; she was not many-sided, but exhibited one quality to perfection—a boundless constancy. There was something of the nun in Desdemona, and it seemed strange that Shakespeare should have given the whitest of his heroines to a Moor. "Most writers," said Miss Terry, "when they draw a pure woman draw a silly one. Shakespeare made no such blunder." Very vividly she then gave the scene between Emilia and Desdemona, and in the following theme interpreted the potion-scene of "Romeo and Juliet" with thrilling effect. It was a mistake to express the youth of Juliet in terms of to-day: "Juliet was more than a girl in love—she was a poet in love; quieter and graver than her years would suggest, in her eyes there burns a splendour as in all eyes that dream of things to come." Destiny seems to hang over her from the first, and to shadow forth her end. She was a tender girl with a man's heart.

In the second half of her address Miss Terry treated of various other well-known heroines more briefly, and referred to the brilliant volume by Mr. Frank Harris, "The Man Shakespeare," in which the evidence for the dramatist's love for Mary Fitton is so cogently presented. Shakespeare drags nobility out of frail human passion. He was not only poet, it must be remembered, but dramatist, therefore his personal sympathies must not be held responsible for all he wrote. In conclusion, after remarking on the racial distinctions of Shakespeare's heroines—the Italian Juliet, the Spanish Katharine of Arragon, and others—Miss Terry evoked the unbounded enthusiasm of the audience by a magnificent rendering of Ophelia's famous scene. The whole course of her lecture was an intellectual feast, and her vivacity and insight appealed irresistibly to all. Her second lecture, on "The Triumphant Women of Shakespeare," will be given at the Garrick Theatre on Sunday, June 11th, at 8.30, for the Pioneer Players.

"Olaf Liliekrans," a "national play," by Henrik Ibsen, is to be given its first presentation (it has only recently been translated) in English by the Ibsen Club on Sunday, June 18th, at the Rehearsal Theatre, Maiden-lane.

This play, oddly enough, ranks as Ibsen's second attempt at play-writing, third in his produced works, and fourth as a finished play. It was produced on January 2nd, 1857, at the Bergen Theatre with considerable success.

The theme—the old legend of the "Ptarmigan of the Justedal"—was so well known to the Norwegians that it could not startlingly advance the reputation of the young poet and playwright, though it proved that he was a man to be reckoned with in the future. In fact his next play laid the foundation of his world-wide fame, for with "Olaf Liliekrans" he closed his romance period, and began to write his more intimate dramas of real life, with which most of us are now familiar.

A MODERN MAGICIAN

By Frank Harris

For something over one hundred years the best steel and iron were produced in England. Sheffield razors and English shot-guns were the best in the world. Then one heard that the finest dental instruments were being made in the United States, and a little later German razors began to take the lead, and Krupp barrels. German papers do not hesitate to say that it is German science which has beaten English traditional and rule-of-thumb methods, and the other day the representative of Krupp declared that the heavy guns in the English Navy were markedly inferior to the German weapons. "The English can't make first-rate guns" was his dictum. There was probably some truth in this patriotic boast; we must therefore console ourselves with the belief that the Englishman behind the gun may see straighter or shoot straighter than his German rival, and thus make up for the inferiority of his cannon. Unfortunately we have also been beaten in armour-plating. The best ship armour at present is made by the Harvey-Krupp process, and all English warships have had to pay toll to Krupp for his superior cleverness. The Harvey-Krupp patents are now running out, and there is some reason to believe that the disgrace of our inferiority in the manufacture of armour-plating is about to be taken away—if indeed it has not already been taken away.

A leading article recently appeared in The Times Engineering Supplement drawing attention to the Simpson armour:

> Some three years ago Mr. W. S. Simpson, in the course of experiments, discovered by chance, says The Times, that copper and steel when treated in a certain way formed a molecular mixture or solid solution of the two metals. After some trials he found that when two plates of steel, with a section or layer of copper between them, were placed in a mixture of carbon, brown sugar, and water, of the consistency of compressed snow, and the whole mass submitted to a temperature of 2,000deg. F., the copper melted away into the steel and formed a perfect weld. So complete was the union between the two plates that, however treated, they would not part or split at the juncture. Not only was this the case, but the copper, when it entered the steel, increased the tenacity of the latter metal. Samples of such welds were submitted to Professor J. O. Arnold, of the University of Sheffield, who examined them by alternating stress tests and micrographic analysis. Referring to one micrograph he said that it showed
>
> "A portion of the thin weld line in which a considerable part of the copper seam has disappeared, owing to the metal dissolving in the steel, to form a solid solution micrographically almost indistinguishable from the steel itself. Had the welding been continued for some time longer there would be no visible weld line left, but merely a solution of copper in the steel, molecularly continuous with the steel itself, and considerably strongly than the main body of metal, because the copper will have disappeared (visually) after having brought into perfect continuity the molecules of both faces of the steel. The fact that the copper joint is completely soluble in the steel means that to the eye there is no copper visible, it being in a molecular form beyond the range of microscopic vision as an inter-molecular absorption of the copper and steel considerably stronger than the steel itself. The weld, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, no longer exists, hence securing absolute molecular continuity; it is therefore obvious that welds made by this process are stronger than the steel itself."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It may readily be imagined that such a welding process may be put to many uses, but for the purpose of the present article its application to armour plates is especially interesting. As is well known, by the face-hardening processes which have been in use for some time past, carburisation of the armour-plate does not extend to a greater depth than seven-eighths of an inch. A hard face and a tough back are obtained, but the hard face is neither as hard nor as thick as could be wished. If, then, it were possible to take high-speed steel, say, of double this thickness, and weld it to a soft steel backing, an immense advantage would be gained, and this is what can be done with the Simpson weld. Not only is the high-speed steel many times harder than ordinary steel, but the hardened face of the plate can be made of any thickness desired. It is understood that trials have been made already with plates of the usual regulation size, in which two inches of hard steel were welded to four inches of soft, and which, when attacked by a 6-in. gun, gave entirely satisfactory results.

The Simpson discovery has sent the engineering world talking. The Glasgow Herald shows that the Simpson welding process is also valuable in the manufacture of ordinary ship-plates, for Mr. Simpson can weld a skin of copper on steel one-hundredth or one-quarter of an inch in thickness at will, and this mixture does not corrode.

The Glasgow Herald concludes:—

> If that proves really to be the case, the effect on ship-building will be tremendous, for the cost of coating hulls in order to preserve them and the cost of docking for hull-cleaning will be eliminated from the economy of shipowning. The new plates will, as a matter of course, cost more than those made in the ordinary way. But the increase will be very small. I asked a gentleman to-day who knows something about it, and according to his calculations the cost of treating the material for a vessel of 500ft. drawing 25ft. of water will be no more than £1,250.

It now costs £1,000 to clean the hull of the Mauretania, and the hull must be cleaned three or four times a year. The saving by the use of the Simpson process is therefore evident.

But who is this Mr. Simpson, and what else has he done? It is easy to learn all about him, for he lives in London, and London is the Enchanted City. You can find China in it and New York, Lima and Suez; I have seen the moon rise over the Serpentine so that I took it for the Nile, and a sunset on Westminster Bridge has transported me to the banks of the Limpopo. There is everything in London, and Aladdin's Cave is in Victoria-street. It is on the ground floor, and as soon as you enter you meet the magician—a man five feet ten or eleven in height, but so broad that he seems shorter, of extraordinarily powerful physique; the hair and beard are snow-white, but the brow and eyes are leonine and full of life.

Looking at him, with his long, white hair and high forehead, one would take him for a poet; and, indeed, William Spiers Simpson is a poet—a poet who works not in words, but in metals—one of the wonder-workers of the modern industrial world.

Like most great men, the little known of his life is very simple. He was born of good farming stock in Renfrew, in Scotland, in 1845. Like many Scottish lads, he gave himself as willingly to his books as to athletics; he was one of the best runners and boxers in the place, and yet spent most of his leisure reading mechanics.

He went to Glasgow University when he was seventeen or eighteen years of age, and studied under Macquorne Rankin, Professor of Engineering. The lad was fortunate in having such a teacher; under his guidance he learned a good deal, and, like most men of talent, made the best of what he learned.

Glasgow could not keep him long. Before he was twenty-one, what Dr. Johnson called "the most beautiful view in Scotland for the Scotsman"—"the high road to London"—drew him, and he has been in London ever since.

"Extraordinarily fortunate" he calls himself in all that he has done and is doing. One of the instances of good fortune which he always gives is that he has never been refused a patent either in America or Germany, and he has taken out about thirty in each of these countries. This is probably a singular fact, for the Britisher in Germany who applies for a patent is called upon to justify his demand to the hilt.

Now my readers will be asking what Mr. Simpson has done and what he has discovered. His sympathies and activities are endless. Like all the rest of us, he has taken a certain interest in aeroplaning, and accordingly has discovered a metal, or rather has invented a metal, which is as tough as wrought-iron and lighter than aluminium. This metal can be used for the ribs and wings of aeroplanes with great advantage, and for the bodies of motor-cars, for it is not only incredibly light and strong, but also incorrodible. The worst of it is, it is somewhat dear.

Mr. Simpson, too, is patriotic, like most large-hearted people, so he turned his attention to gunnery, and has invented an electric cannon which can throw a missile from Dover to Paris, and which has no recoil whatever. Colonel Maude, an expert gunner, declares that this is "the greatest modern invention in gunnery." Mr. Simpson has given it to War Office.

But his pet achievement—the lyric of his art, so to speak—is the use of electricity as a motor force. Mr. Simpson is still working on this, improving and changing, and he is reluctant to talk about it yet. All that he will say is that he hopes in a short time to send a ship round the world at a cost of something less than a shilling.

"But why not complete it? There must be millions in such an invention," the average man exclaims. No doubt there are millions; but Mr. Simpson is an inventor-poet, and not a money-grubber. As soon as he has invented one thing he lays it aside for another discovery.

"Man does not live by bread alone," he says, smiling, "and if I had tried to make money I should have made fewer discoveries, and I prefer the discoveries."

When will some Krupp come along and mobilise Mr. Simpson and his discoveries, and turn the poet-inventor into the greatest Captain of Industry our time has known?

Or perhaps it would be wiser still to encourage him to go on inventing. The age is ripe for a larger unveiling. We have done more towards the conquest of Nature in the last hundred years than was done in twenty or two thousand previous centuries. And the greatest wonders are the most recent—the X-rays by which we can see through bodies and the aeroplanes that dart from place to place above us in the blue faster than bird can fly.

Already distance is annihilated and national boundaries made ridiculous and Custom-houses as antiquated as sedan-chairs. We are all alive with hope; thrilling with expectation. As Hugo cried:

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Que ce soit pour mourir ou que ce soit pour vivre,
> Ce siècle va voir un accomplissement.

But in THE ACADEMY one has to ask what is the spiritual meaning of all our material progress and all our discoveries; or have they alone among the mysteries no significance for the soul? First of all, one notices that the new spirit came into the world about the time of the American Revolt and the French Revolution. "The Rights of Man" was the first dogma of the new creed, spiritually construed, the first declaration of faith in twenty centuries. And with the dawn of the new Belief the old scepticisms and inanities and formalisms all vanished like unclean ghosts. Europe thrilled to the pulsing feet of French soldiers; but these were only the outward and visible sign of the quickening new ideas; at length the peoples awoke from the age-long lethargy and slumber.

The new hope and new trust in the spirit of man brought ever new discoveries; here and there the light was pushed forward into the encircling gloom. "Space and time," cried the solitary thinker, "are only forms of man's thought," and forthwith railroads and steamships and aeroplanes began to annihilate distance and make the philanthropic dreamings of a Howard possible. Time, too, is under man's control, and with the timorous hope the number of his years was increased and the length of each day extended by new and startling experiences.

In measure as our faith grows our mastery over Nature must increase; every generous impulse obeyed, every new insight acted upon and turned into law must extend the material conquest: as the spirit grows it makes for itself a new body as easily as the serpent a new skin.

If we trust the best in us and act upon it fearlessly, the age of wonders has only begun: the curtain of the Invisible is nothing but our doubting and the Impossible nothing but our cowardly apprehensions: for we are the children of the Almighty, and in nature one with the Creator.

MUSIC

To feel "out of it" when one is in the company of the intelligent, or of those who pass for such, is a sad experience. No one, perhaps, likes to feel an alien. If we could suppose Lord St. Aldegonde to have accepted a "dinner invitation" from Mrs. Gashleigh, not all the richness of the fine mock-turtle and the stewed pigeons would have comforted him. He would still have preferred his own "set," and the people who thought as he did and liked cold beef. The present writer is conscious of unhappy sensations of inferiority when he finds himself at Queen's Hall in the midst of an eager throng of the rapturous and the hopeful about to hear a new magnum opus by that admirable composer Sir Edward Elgar. If he were allowed to enjoy Sir Edward's clever music without having to accept it as something superhuman, to delight in the beauty of the orchestral colouring, to be charmed by the deft interweaving of themes and the graceful elegance of the lyric passages; if he might say, "this is very pleasant to listen to, and happy is the nation that can produce so talented a composer," he would not feel so wretchedly inferior, so disposed to reproach the Providence which has seen fit to deny him the full enjoyment of the Elgarian masterpieces. But he knows that he is among those to whom these compositions are very great masterpieces, something sublime and wonderful. For these a great day has come; they are confident of an hour's exquisite thrill. Breathlessly they listen, their faces excited yet reverent; and there are some who, though they look so bored, will, before midnight, have written an ecstatic pæan of praise in their journal. Is his inability to share in the universal enthusiasm a sign that the age of musical fogeydom has arrived to the solitary who can only enjoy the new Symphony with a tempered pleasure? He fears that it must be so, for he knows of a young whipper-snapper, who cannot be more than forty, who thinks Elgar a much greater composer than Schubert, and it is hopeless for him ever to try and reach the platform from which such a judgment can be delivered. Yet would he be thankful if his limitations were not so great, if he were permitted to feel the enthralling power of all this music, if he could honestly recognise in Sir Edward Elgar the profound philosopher, the prince of mystics, the "sanest of the moderns," as he is told he ought?

But on the evening when Elgar's Second Symphony was produced it was difficult to repress an inquiry as to the possibility that the number of enthusiasts about the composer's music is not increasing, nay, that it may even be diminishing. One had naturally supposed that, according to custom, every seat in the hall would be occupied on so great an occasion. This, however, was far from being the case. The gallery, indeed, which is usually besieged by members of what is certainly the backbone of the musical amateur class (for not only do you pay less for your seat there, but you hear better than anywhere else) was almost empty! In all seriousness one suspected that the gallery amateurs had stayed away because they feared to find no room there; otherwise it seems impossible to account for the sparse attendance. While unable to join with the young people who exalt Elgar above Schubert and Co., we certainly look upon the première of a new Symphony by so deservedly popular and eminent an Englishman as an occasion when Queen's Hall should be entirely filled. We believe that the reputation of Elgar as a composer will be all the more fairly established when his adorers have ceased, in speaking and writing about him, to "toss their splendid epithets about them" in the way they do. It will be time to begin to regard him as a great prophet when we see the depth and extent of the influence he has exercised upon the coming schools of composition, when we see whether, like Wagner, Brahms, Strauss, Franck, he has founded a school. But we must all admit that he is one of the most interesting figures in the history of British music, and we were sorry to see the empty seats at Queen's Hall.

We liked the Symphony better in the evening than we had done at the rehearsal in the morning, and this was a good augury, for, except in the case of the "Variations," which must still be regarded as incontestably his finest work, we have not found that Elgar's music has improved on further acquaintance. The first movement, we had been told, was to take us into the country on a morning of Spring. Well, it was very pleasant to be there; we were reminded of the "Printemps" of J. F. Millet, for it was clear before long that there would be showers as well as sunlight. When the clouds came, we found their musical expression really beautiful and moving; in fact, this second section of the first movement seemed perhaps the most original and imaginative part of the Symphony. Now and then Spring threatened to "set in with its usual severity," but on the whole it was decidedly agreeable weather, and though the country may not have had any specially prominent features to make it picturesque—no mountains or lakes—yet the colour of it all was so rich and varied that this absence of striking "motifs" was not severely felt. Sometimes the composer had treated us to so fresh and vivid a contribution of orchestral tints that his fields seemed really to be "dressed in living green." It was like the view of a young cornfield in Tuscany as you flash past it in the train, and then we were in the brown wood again. The "Larghetto" is, no doubt, an eloquent elegy; but during its course we were conscious of a feeling of monotony. One need not expect a composer to have something quite new to say every time he puts pen to paper. Still he may choose new language for his old thoughts, and here Elgar's "pretty filchings" from his former works are fairly numerous, and his passion for a sequence is specially apparent. The movement is plaintive rather than pathetic, and if it was designed as something in the nature of an elegy on the death of King Edward, it is not a very congruous tribute.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

With the meaning of the "Rondo" we do not greatly care to concern ourselves. It is brilliant, and the opening, at any rate, is fully in harmony with what one would expect in a Symphony of Spring. Its Strauss-like section, with its Berlioz-like accompaniment, came upon us surprisingly; but, then, Spring has its surprises, and the section may not be quite out of keeping. The "Finale" will probably prove the most popular movement of the four on account of its evident tunefulness, its healthy swing, and a certain magnificence of energy. We ourselves were inclined to rank the first movement as the best, as being the most spontaneous and the most freshly coloured. But we cannot deny praise to the composer, who has succeeded in evolving a "Finale" so strong and so suitable. Two days after the production of Elgar's Symphony, M. Mylnarski, the Polish musician who conducts the Glasgow Orchestra, introduced us to his Symphony "Polonia," and to a Symphony in B flat minor by Wischnegradsky. Both of these showed great competence in orchestral device and abundance of what we may presume to be "local colouring" (though a conspicuously Scottish bit in Mylnarski's music sounded anything but Polish), but neither of these clever works approached that of Elgar in mastery, science, or feeling.

A great deal of beautiful music has been heard in London of late. The augmented band conducted by Sir Henry Wood at the London Musical Festival performances was one of the finest we ever heard, and its playing of Strauss' magnificent "Zarathrustra" was superb, to mention nothing else among its achievements. Mr. Harold Bauer, by his playing of Mozart's Concerto in D minor, proved his right to be considered the finest interpreter of Mozart's piano compositions now before the public. His delivery of those simple phrases which are, in fact, the most difficult of any in the world to do well, was even beyond that of M. Pugno in its perfection. Mr. Theodore Stier, at the first concert of his "Bechstein Hall Orchestra," a delightful concert, gave Londoners a first hearing of the enchanting little overture to Wolff-Ferrari's opera "The Secret of Susan," which is promised at Covent Garden this season. Casals, Kreisler, Mmes. Culp and Gerhardt have been among the great artists who have been heard, and we must not forget to give a cordial word of praise and gratitude to Dr. Walford Davies for his brilliant and very attractive suite "Parthenia," produced at the Musical Festival. A composer who can write such tunes and handle his orchestra so lightly is as worthy as Elgar himself of a European reputation.

A STORM AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

By W. H. Koebel

The blue of the sky has become obscured by heavy masses of grey cloud. The ominous gloom has rolled overhead to the accompaniment of lightning flashes and dull peals of thunder. The noisy threat, however, has proved no empty one. In Misiones, this far north-eastern province of Argentina, there is seldom a cloud without its watery consequence. There is no doubt that all Nature in the neighbourhood is acutely aware of this. Although a couple of the great, hawklike Carancho birds are scurrying in haste across the grey horizon, the lesser feathered folk are already snugly hidden within their leafy shelters. The flowers are bereft of their nimbus of gorgeous butterflies, and the vicious-looking giant wasp that has been darting in straight lines to and fro through the air has betaken himself to his own particular refuge—probably a tree where the wasp honey is stored. Even the great inch-long ants have ceased to hurry their bodies in brisk aggressiveness over the earth. It is as though the weather-wise creature life of the world here had shortened sail in preparation for the outburst that it knew was imminent.

Then has come the warning breeze, heavily laden with moisture—and then the rain itself! Its advance is as perceptible as that of a host of living beings. The dull grey curtain comes on with a rustling sigh that increases in volume as it advances. A few seconds later it has enveloped the small encampment. Rain such as this has many notes. The great drops are roaring upon the canvas of the tent, striking a sharper, drumlike rattle from the hard, broad leaves of the resounding palms, and belabouring the wet earth itself with stinging, liquid plashes until the red soil churns into new and swelling puddles. The force of the downpour searches every corner of the land, beating with the same undiscriminating zeal upon the fragile blossoms and upon the corpulent backs of the great frogs as they rejoice at the edges of the pools.

An hour later the storm has passed away to bury its rumblings and crashes beneath the horizon that has once again resolved itself into a brilliant and undimmed blue. A short but sharp deluge this—the rearguard of a procession of rains that have recently come and gone. The countryside, freshly washed and glistening, is marked by neither habitation nor human being. The solitude of the spot is not necessarily to be accounted for by the recent storm; it is a not unusual phase of the sparsely populated stretches of rolling hills and woodland. Any reflection on this point, however, is soon disturbed by the appearance of an object that has emerged from behind a shoulder of the country, and that is moving across the level spread of natural meadowland which intervenes between the camp and a forest belt that separates the small plain from the rising ground beyond.

The galera, the public coach, viewed from this distance, appears to proceed at a crawling pace, although in reality it is speeding along in right gallant fashion. To the naked eye the sunlight glistens upon yellow paint and upon the white of the tarpaulin that covers the pile of luggage on the roof of the vehicle. By the aid of the glasses the livelier details of the progress become evident. Harnessed to the front of the coach nine horses are galloping along in a confused but vigorous bunch, the water of the pools spraying upwards in sheets from their hoofs as the cumbrous body of the vehicle itself rocks to and fro in the full flight of its career. The exhilaration of this rapid motion through the surface waters is obvious enough from even this distance. The whip of the driver is waving through the air now, and the speed of the team increases as it gallops down a slight dip in the ground.

Then something has happened. The vehicle has slowed abruptly in its course, and the horses are plunging wildly, first straight ahead, and then to right and left, as the coach is jerked to a halt. For a minute or two the driver's whip is whirling through the air as ceaselessly as a skipping-rope in the hands of a child, while the maddened animals in front surge to and fro in frantic eddies that continue remorselessly restricted in area. Presently the commotion dies away. The horses stand motionless as the movements of the lash cease, and the driver descends reluctantly from his seat. The contest has been abandoned for the time being. The galera is firmly stuck in a mudhole.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The appeal of misfortune, when distant, is unjustly faint. Viewed through glasses at a range of a couple of miles, this drama of arrested progress is curiously impersonal in its effect. The driver and his assistant have evidently conferred together for a long while ere the disconsolate forms of three passengers emerge from the body of the galera to join the officials of the expedition. Then, pulling their feet laboriously from the mud, they each seek the least moist spot in the vicinity. There they wait—there is nothing else for them to do. It is a clear case of utter shipwreck on land. A common enough incident of the road in such weather, but none the less disconcerting for that. There is the galera, that by now should have sped over the hill and far away, a stationary point in a hopeless calm, reflecting all the while the sun's rays from its paint in a mocking parody of joy.

The sun has risen to its highest point in the heavens, and has already begun to sink when the five forlorn land mariners gather together once again. On this occasion it is evident from the violent gestures of the passengers that they have begun to discover the value of time—a question that no reasonable being would suppose to interest the driver of a galera. Nevertheless the argument has undoubtedly borne fruit: for half an hour or so later there is a stir about the body of the coach. The jehu and his assistant have clambered to the roof. There ensues a cataract of trunks and boxes that, flung from above, strike great splashes of water from the earth as they fall. The act is doubtless the revenge of the driver. The ship is being lightened—at the expense of the passengers, the pathos of whose bearing is not to be mistaken even at this distance. Presently the forms of the horses are struggling desperately forward again, while tiny smokelike clouds mark the explosions of the whip. And this time the cumbrous galera lurches slowly forward, gains in impetus, and rushes up in triumph from out of the dip. When the sun has all but sunk there is no more galera. Filled again with passengers and luggage it has climbed the hill until the tiny speck of its body dips over into the horizon. Its passage is rather regrettable, for the landscape has become quite lonely again. And what do four hours either way matter to a galera?

THE TEMPLE FLOWER SHOW

In the short space at our disposal last week it was impossible to do more than outline the main features of the above show and to mention a few of the more notable novelties. Amongst new orchids, the most remarkable were Caelogyne Burfordiensis, which was granted an award of merit; it was shown by Sir Trevor Lawrence, and is the result of a cross between Caelogyne Asperata and Caelogyne Pandurata. Odontioda "Coronation," exhibited by Mr. Vuylsteke, was awarded a first-class certificate; and Cattleya Schroderae "Queen Mary," shown by Messrs. Sander and Son, was granted an award of merit. A new rose is "Freda," a hybrid tea, exhibited by Messrs. Paul and Son. A fine seedling was "Mrs. George Shawyer," raised by Messrs. Lowe and Shawyer, and shown by Mr. George Mount. A rather striking flower is "Mrs. Longworth," which is a striped Caroline Testout.

Amongst the carnations "Princess Juliana" will undoubtedly be a great favourite, as will "Queen Mary," a dark crimson clove, exhibited by Messrs. Cutbush. The progress made by hybridisers of Gerbera Jamesoni has indeed been remarkable. The fruits of their endeavours were much in evidence. Eremuri were again superb. When once their culture is properly understood they will undoubtedly be extensively grown. A complete departure from the ordinary run of flowers was seen in Mr. Hemsley's hybrid Myosotis, a cross between Alpestris Alba and Royal Blue: its distinctive feature is a white cross upon a blue ground.

The time of Sweet-peas is as yet scarcely ripe. Sterling Stent should hold its own among the salmon coloured varieties. Two beautiful peas are Iris, of the palest salmon pink, and Hercules, also of the palest imaginable pink.

We were glad to observe the silver cups awarded to Mr. Clarence Elliott and to the Craven Nursery. Mr. Elliott's display included a fine group of the rare Campanula Alliona. Mr. Reuthe had two notable introductions in Saxifraga Brunoniana and Lewisia Cotyledon. Mr. Lloyd Edwards had some more good mossy saxifrages, and Dr. Macwatt brought a nice lot of primulas, amongst which we noticed particularly Lissadel hybrid and Forbesii. A fine silvery saxifrage was "Dr. Ramsay," a hybrid from Macnabiana and Lantoscana Superba. Annuals do not bulk largely at the Temple Show. Amongst the few shown Dimorphotheca Aurantiaca made a brave display. A good new Cosmos is the pink early-flowering "Rose Queen." One of the best of the Darwin Tulips was "Clara Butt." Good yellows are "Bouton d'Or" and "Inglescombe Yellow."

"Aquilegia Stuarti" was as beautiful as ever; a pleasing foil would be Pyrethrum Roseum Nanum of a most pleasing shade of pink.

In the Novelty Tent was to be seen an alpine long desired by enthusiasts—the pink Ramondia Pyrenaica Rosea, exhibited by Messrs. Backhouse. Messrs. Veitch had a good new Impatiens called "Herzogii." Once more a protest must be entered against the floral overcrowding. People attend this great show to admire, not to be blinded. We were accordingly most grateful to Messrs. Reamsbottom and to Messrs. Lilley for the tasteful way in which they staged "St. Brigid" anemones and bulbous flowers respectively.

A ROMAN IN LONDON

Maximus Sabellius to Quintus Marius

I promised you, my dear Quintus, to write of that which I saw in Albion during the Coronation of King George and Queen Mary. London will be a strange term to you. It is the Londinium of our great Julius, who found it a village amidst the marshes which lie round the Flumen Thamesis. Now it has developed into the greatest city of the world, the capital of a mighty Empire which surpasses in extent and population even our Roman Empire at the apogee of her fame. But first let me tell you, Quintus, that if you expect a description of how London looks on this historic occasion you will be grievously disappointed. You would naturally expect that the good citizens of the metropolis would wish to show their city at its best whilst so many strangers from all quarters of the globe are in their midst; but not so: they have deliberately gone out of their way to disfigure it. All the principal streets, public buildings, and monuments, of which we have heard so much, have been hidden altogether or hopelessly disfigured by the unsightly stands erected by the Government or by seat speculators. It surpasses all we ever heard of the lamentable taste of the English in the management of their public affairs. Could anything be more absurd than deliberately to disfigure your city, every street and every building of which recalls some bygone page in her history, in order to celebrate the Coronation of your King and Queen?

London is packed, Quintus, with foreigners, in the same manner as our Rome became the centre of attraction for all kinds of colonials and barbarians in the days of her decadence, when luxury had sapped the primitive prowess of our race. One morning I wandered down to see Westminster Abbey and the St. Margaret's Church, and also the Houses of Parliament. They were almost hidden by the huge stands erected around them, whilst the statues of the great Senators alone arose above the boards as if refusing to be immersed in this wave of wood, and to protest against the desecration of this historic ground. I then traversed the route over which the Procession will pass. They now resemble the cheap seats in a travelling circus, and at intervals of fifty yards are hideous wooden poles painted yellow; and on the day of the Procession these are to be decorated with cheap paper festoons and lighted at night by electric arc lamps. The houses of the nobles, of the merchant princes, and of the wealthy party hacks—many of whom soon hope to receive the patent of nobility in return for cash down—rival each other in the gaudiness of their trimming; the innumerable clubs where so many of the youth, middle-age, and dotage of England are wont to idle their time away in futile discussions over the lamentable decline in their country's greatness are already covered with boards and hoardings.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The seats in the public stands are sold for as much as £10 to £5; rooms with a single window are being offered at £100, and they tell me that the rents of private houses have risen as much as 100 per cent. all over London. The great hostelries have doubled their charges, and force their guests to take their rooms for the entire month of June. But the depredations of these seat-sellers are likely to defeat their own end, for many of the barbarians who are expected from America have been frightened by the rumours that have reached them of the expense of even a brief sojourn in the Imperial City. This has come as a great shock to the hostelry managers and seat speculators, who were relying on the primitive simplicity of these hordes of barbarians, with their love of pomp, pageantry, princes, and peers, to fill their purses for a long time to come. The result is prices are certain to come down with a sudden rush. The sole idea of every one, Quintus, is to make money out of the Coronation. Verily Napoleon was right when he called them a nation of shopkeepers. To-day they are a nation of seat-sellers. The discomfort of it all is past belief. It is unsafe to take exercise, because there is literally no place to walk. In the streets you are always in danger of being run over by huge, noisy, motor-'buses or quickly-darting taxis, and if you stay on the pavement your passage is blocked by workmen with long beams who are erecting the stands, which adjut out over your head, so that it is no uncommon thing for a log of wood to fall at your feet or for a fallen pole to stop your passage. If you endeavour to sleep in the morning, the constant sound of the hammering renders slumber impossible.

Then how can I describe the streets to you? They literally swarm with citizens and visitors, who gaze in wonder and awe at the preparations. The barbarians from across the Atlantic are in the majority. Many of them have taken the houses of the nobility—most of whom, having little money, are only too pleased to make hay while the monarchy lasts—and they proceed to decorate these houses and to entertain on an even more lavish scale than the English themselves. Next in numbers, Quintus, come the Germans, who stroll about in strange raiment, carrying guide-books, and examining everything with minute thoroughness. They talk in deep gutturals, and gaze in envy on the wealth and luxury around them, which, according to common report, they are to own one day.

A few days ago the Emperor of the Germans came to London on a visit. I should explain, Quintus, that his mother was the daughter of Victoria, the great Queen who reigned so long over Albion. Now the English, to recall for all time the virtues of Victoria, have erected a memorial in front of the Royal Palace. As a work of art, Quintus, we would not have tolerated it in Rome. It represents everything that is bourgeois and puritanical, and therefore it pleases the English, the great majority of whom are bourgeois aud puritanical to an incredible degree. It is on conventional lines, the figures are mothers and angels holding infants or treading on serpents, and the inevitable Neptunes spout water from their mouths. Over all is a winged figure of Victory standing on a mound which gives him so little foothold that at any moment it looks as if Victory might fall into the fountain underneath. But then the idea of the sculptor was to show that Albion's power depends on her ruling the waves, and, therefore, I suppose, the precarious position of Victory is singularly appropriate. The Emperor of Germany, out of his customary filial devotion, came over to attend the unveiling of this memorial. He was very well received by the English, who fear him, but at the same time admire his great qualities and strength of character. There are rumours that his daughter may marry the eldest son of the English King, and this causes great joy because the English hope the Germans will then stop building Dreadnoughts against them. But all this is but the idle gossip of the markets and clubs, and there may be no truth in it.

Many Gauls are to be seen in London, especially ladies of the kind who haunt the boulevards and frequent the cafés, for they are always attracted by events like these. The Gauls are very popular, for Britannia and Gaul are close allies, not because they love one another, but from a common fear of the Germans, whom both at heart detest. . . . Then there are Austrians, Slavs, Iberians, Syrians, Turks, Indian Princes, great Rajahs, Japanese, and Chinese. In addition many visitors have come from the overseas dependencies. Each of the great Provinces of the Empire has sent over its Prime Minister as a special delegate to discuss questions affecting the security of the Empire. I do not envy the lot of these Colonial Premiers, for so they are called. You must understand, Quintus, that one of the great questions which divide the Popular Party from the Patrician Party at the present day is Colonial Preference and Fiscal Reform. They have been squabbling over this matter and turning what should be a business discussion into a party question for the last eight years. Now, the Free Traders never cease telling the Colonial Premiers that the future of the Empire depends on Free Trade, and that the mass of the people are bitterly opposed to Protection; whereas the Protectionists never cease telling the Premiers that the future of the Empire depends on Protection, and that the people are only awaiting the next Election to return the Protectionist Party by an enormous majority. So what can the overseas Premiers do?

Indeed, Quintus, nothing could be stranger than the apathy of the masses towards all political questions and towards the future of their country. A very large number go about openly saying, "We must see this Coronation, because it marks the apogee of our greatness; from it will date our decline and downfall." But very few seem to take the matter seriously to heart, or to have any remedy to suggest, and there is no leader strong enough to come forward and boldly tell the nation that something is wrong. Really, Quintus, London at the present time reminds me forcibly of the state of Rome just before the invasion of the barbarians from the North under Attila the Hun. Love of amusement and of new sensations predominates, and there is complete indifference toward the vital questions of the day.

The Senate which has played such an honourable rôle in the past has now fallen into disrepute, and excites the contempt of the populace. In it are to be found men of first-rate ability, but three-fourths are devoid of special talent, and take no part in politics except to vote the way they are told. Now the Liberals, who are known as the Popular Party, wish to do away with the Senate altogether, and to concentrate all the power in the hand of their own unscrupulous and corrupt executive. The Patrician Party, who compose four-fifths of the Senate, have now awoken to the fact that it has not kept pace with the times, and so they wish to reform it, and thus preserve some of their former power and social position which a seat gives to the occupant. As no Bill can become law until it has passed the Senate, it is very difficult for the Popular Party to do away with it. Therefore, they propose to create five hundred new Peers to swamp the vote of the Patricians. Did you ever hear of a more ridiculous situation, or one more calculated to make Albion the laughing-stock of all nations? Does not it seem strange that after all we have heard of their past history and its glories that it is possible to find five hundred Britons who will accept titles on such terms? Yet such, Quintus, is the love of titles and orders and all that appertains to outward show that the Popular Party expect to have no difficulty in finding amongst their followers enough nonentities who are willing to accept this seal of shame.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

You see, Quintus, to what a depth of degradation this once proud nation has fallen. There is a perfect mania for titles and patents of nobility. Formerly they were only given for great services to the State. Now they are bought for gold. To the poor man they are a very good investment, for let me tell you what has become quite a common practice. When they get made members of the Senate they take unto themselves the name of some blameless village hitherto unknown to fame, and call themselves after it. Then they borrow a little money and sail unto the land of the barbarians and offer themselves in marriage to some rich chief's daughter. Now the latter love titles, and, knowing nothing of those who come over, are only too willing to ally themselves with these usurpers of honour, and thus you have the strange spectacle of totally unknown ladies, from a land four thousand miles away, going about bearing the name of some peaceful hamlet they have never even seen! They tell a funny story, Quintus, of one of these marriages; but first I must explain that a bicycle is the lowest and cheapest mode of self-propelment, used by mechanics and navvies and poor yokels. Now one of these Senators, having secured a rich bride, took her to a fashionable temple of Hymen in the land of the barbarians. She, according to their strange custom, promised to obey him for all time, and he in return has to say, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow." Whereupon a voice was heard to say, "Why, that poor fellow's lost his bicycle!"

Then, Quintus, let me tell you more of these islanders. You know what brought about the decline of our beloved Rome more surely than any other cause; was it not the decay of the military spirit? When we ceased to recruit our legions from amongst our countrymen and relied on foreign mercenaries then our doom was sealed. Well, you will find exactly the same process of decay here. As their mighty Empire has extended so have their legions contracted. Instead of increasing the number of their legions they have actually reduced them. They have a small Army, 90 per cent. of whom are recruited from amongst those who cannot find work. But the mass of the nation have no acquaintance with the use of arms, and openly declare that the days of warfare are obsolete and that all questions can be settled by arbitration. Holding these views, they go about boasting of the extent of their Empire and to the fact that they control 300,000,000 of people in India alone. These ideals are no doubt sound in themselves, but what is the use of considering them seriously when Europe remains an armed camp?

You remember, Quintus, how the Emperors kept the Roman mob quiet and loyal by providing them with free bread and wine and continuous public games, at enormous cost to the State, with the result that the people became so pampered and spoilt as to be incapable of defending themselves when the invader appeared at our gates. But these bribes are as nought compared with what the Popular Party offer to the people in order to retain their support. They give away millions each year in non-contributory old-age pensions, and now they are going to insure the whole nation practically free of charge. Then the public games here are on a scale undreamt of in Rome. In return for votes they are prepared to give the people anything they ask for except work, which alone is of practical value to them.

Now, Quintus, I must bring this letter to an end, but before I lay down my stylo I must tell you of a strange happening of the last few days which has caused much comment. You have heard of the bitter struggle which has raged during the last five years between the Patricians and the Popular Party, the most bitter struggle known in English political history. Every form of personal abuse and vilification has been indulged in, acquaintances have been broken off, and long-standing friendships between political opponents have come to an abrupt end. A few days ago two of the younger members of the Patrician Party gave a fancy dress ball to their friends and supporters in a public dancing-hall. Naturally the majority of the invitations were extended to the members of the Patrician Party, but out of courtesy a few were issued to the leaders of the Popular Party; it was thought, however, that their sense of the fitness of things would prevent them from attending. But, to the surprise of all, the leaders of both parties were present, and one of the most prominent of the Popular Party had the bad taste to come arrayed as the devil, Quintus, although, considering the feelings with which he is regarded, his disguise was somewhat unnecessary. This affair has caused much comment, and will give you better than any word of mine an idea of the hopeless state of apathy and insincerity into which all parties have sunk, and how little they hold their Constitution or the future of their Empire at heart. For all are willing to foregather in perfect amity at a fancy dress ball, which fact strikingly recalls our own Nero playing one of his vile selections on the violin whilst Rome was burning.—Your friend,

MAXIMUS SABELLIUS.

DUTCH DYKES IN ENGLAND

ENGLAND is a microcosm. In race, landscape, atmosphere she has learnt the secret of a dozen different climes and peoples. For centuries she steadily assimilated Dutch immigrants, who poured into East Anglia to escape intolerable political servitude in their own land. The ravages of the sea on this coast line have gone on throughout the historic period without let or hindrance. In Stuart days "Hollandyrs" were for the most part engaged when any attempt was made to check sea encroachment.

There is one branch of marsh craft in which the Dutchman was supreme in those days and has not now lost his cunning—i.e., in the making and holding of what may be termed amphibian lands. There are vast fertile tracts of England which lie below the level of high water. Their maintenance is the result of perpetual and unwearied watch and ward. Along the estuary of the Thames, for instance, the clay embankments, "which serve it in the office of a wall," are liable to breaching at any unguarded link in the chain of protection. A liner or a battleship blundering into collision with a sound wall, such as those which exist in this district, might let in the waters and swamp huge areas of pastoral and industrial lands. These "levels" are under the control of bodies of Commissioners, mostly country gentlemen or those engaged in the industry of the county affected. Their duties are carried out without reward or ostentation, and they afford an object lesson in that system of sound county government which has hitherto been the pride of rural Britain. We hear of town rates crushing in character, tales of jobbery and waste crop up from time to time in cities, but in the affairs managed by county gentlemen no such stories come to light.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The protective embankments in local parlance are called "walls." The stranger coming down to the locality and seeing grassy embankments asks, "Where are the walls?" They have many of them performed their protective function for centuries—how many centuries who shall say? Legend or history of the old writers credits the Romans with their formation. That Balbus built a wall we all know from our school days. Be that as it may, Act upon Act was passed in Tudor and Stuart days for "inning" particular stretches of swamp and marsh. In our enlightened times we say that the land costs more to make than it is worth. By all means, then, adds our collective wisdom, let the land wash away, an it will; as for making it, that is an old-fashioned and outworn idea. The Dutchman holds the other view. He sees a vast potential wealth in lands reclaimed; he boldly attacks the problem. Near the famous Kamperdun is an area of pasturage guarded by three tiers of embankments—"the Waker," "the Dreamer," "the Sleeper." Thus jealously do the Dutch guard their paternal acres.

Etymologically the old sea walls are quaint and interesting. Their nomenclature reveals their origin, the slow wisdom of the village sage dipping his nose into profound draughts of old ale and laying down the law in the sanded parlours of inns, which inns have braved the battle and breeze of many a century. The Dutchman calls his embankment a dike, as the Frenchman uses the word digue. His English counterpart in some localities employs the same phrase, dyke, to describe the ditch. On many Essex levels the word delph is substituted for this. No one but a tyro would there suggest any deviation from this phrase. Delph it was in the beginning, and delph it must remain. The words dyke and delph are, after all, first cousins. The dyke is that which is dug (and both ditch and bank come under this category), the delph is that which is delved. In South Wales a ditch or drain is called a "reen," and in the North of Ireland the same thing on a small scale is a "river," on a large scale a "porn;" whereas the English equivalent of a river is known to the Hibernian humourist in language as a "stream."

Recent engineering developments have come about in protective work of this class, due to the initiative of a Dutch State engineer, Mr. de Muralt. That gentleman has brought out systems of armour-plating embankment walls with a veneer of concrete. One system consists of thin slabs or tiles of concrete, secured to the bank with concrete pins and so arranged that at small cost they sheath a clay wall. In another a heavier type of armoured concrete plating is employed. The latter type is laid down in Holland in many localities where sea exposure is extreme. In Great Britain, as usual, the authorities have bided their time. They have let others experiment, and now that over fifty thousand pounds has been expended in Holland on protecting sea embankments by these novel methods, the custodians of our English levels are adopting the same methods with similar success.

The human side of the picture of Holland in England must not be left out of consideration. In the wide wind-bitten marsh lands of East Anglia, teeming with larks and plover, where the quaint old farmhouses are toned and tinted with lichens, so as to look like copies from some rare masterpiece of the Dutch School; where the air is washed to incredible clearness and the din and turmoil of the city are forgotten echoes, a patient, stalwart type of men, closely resembling the "Hollandyr," is reproduced. The tendency of modern conditions is to level these elements down to one monotonous tone of uniformity. Every man who prizes the gaiety of the nation will resist that dulling action, that stealthy blight, under which all colour tends to die from out the picture of life.

The Fenland régime has its own fauna and flora, and land drainage has greatly modified these. Drainage has rendered extinct the great copper butterfly (Chrysophanus dispar), a species which was unique to England. This butterfly wore a half-tropical livery, the forewings of the male being a bright copper red, the hind pale blue. As to bird life, England is vastly more retrograde than Holland. In Holland wide areas are strictly guarded from disturbance as bird sanctuaries. All bird-lovers would rejoice if an adequate tract of marsh and river, woodland and meadow could be set aside in East Anglia, isolated and protected from marauders of every kind, and left year by year to go to prairie. Who knows? Perhaps the bittern might come back to such a spot, the avocet and other vagrants be tempted to resume possession of their old-time quarters.

The flora of a countryside is much less liable to destruction than are its bird and insect life. Bogbean and rare wild orchids and a legion of water-loving plants still tempt the man who "peeps and botanises." All would be well if "hands off" could be called to the professional collector. To such an one a break in the chain of living things is as nothing if he can but make a record bag.

THE BOY IN THE GARDEN

THERE were two kinds of gardening to employ our sunny hours—the one concerned with the vast tracts of the Olympians, the other with the cultivation of those intimate patches of earth known as the children's gardens, wherein was waged an endless contest between Nature and our views of what a garden should be. Of the joys of this nobler order of tillage I have written elsewhere, and I may not penetrate now into that mysterious world beyond the shrubbery, where plants assumed the proportions of mammoth trees, and beds of mustard-and-cress took the imaginative eye of youth as boundless prairies. But if the conventional aims of grown-up gardening set limits to our fancy, if their ideal of beauty in the garden—unfriendly as it was to cricket and the fiercer outbreaks of Indians—was none of ours, we found, nevertheless, certain details in the process by which they sought to attain their illusory ends stimulating and wholly delightful. Flowers might inspire in us no more than a rare and shortlived curiosity, but the watering-pot (and even better the garden-hose) were our very good friends. Tidiness was no merit in the garden of our dreams, but our song of joy rose straight to heaven with the smoke of bonfires. Meadows were more to our taste than the prim culture of lawns, but in our hands the lawn-mower became a flaming chariot, and we who drove it as unscorched Phaetons praised for the zest with which we pursued our pleasure by all Olympus.

It was one of the charms of childhood that such praise would sometimes fall from the lips of our rulers as suddenly and as mysteriously as their censure. It was pleasant, after a gorgeous afternoon spent in extinguishing imaginary conflagrations with the garden house to be congratulated on the industry with which we had watered the flowers. It was pleasant to be rewarded with chocolates from France for burning witches on the rubbish-heap behind the greenhouse.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

As a matter of fact, we never "helped" the gardener unless it suited us, and we would have hidden in the shrubbery a whole day rather than be entrapped into half an hour's weeding—an occupation which we regarded in the light of a severe punishment. And the odd confusion in the grown-up mind between right and wrong never ceased to intrigue us. When my elder brother, in a sentimental hour, flung a wreath of roses on to the stately head of the aunt of the moment, we knew that it was a pretty thought, very happily translated into action; but the Olympians treated it as a crime. Yet it was not his fault that the thorns tore her hair; had there been any thornless roses he would probably have used them. And, being honest, we wondered no less when we were praised for playing with the garden-hose, that coiled about our legs like wet snakes, and made our stockings wet on the warmest summer day; for in our hearts we knew that into any occupation so pleasant must surely enter the elements of crime. But the rulers of our destiny would bid us change our wet clothes with a calm brow, and would congratulate each other on our interest in the garden. We lived in a strange world.

The judgments of the gardener we could better understand, though, alas! we had to sum him up as unreliable. He was a twisted little man who had been to sea in his youth, and we knew that he had been a pirate because he had a red face, an enormous clasp-knife, and knew how to make every imaginable kind of knot. Moreover, there was a small barrel in the tool-house that had manifestly held gunpowder once upon a time. Such evidence as this was not to be refuted, but we had to conclude that he had been driven from the High Seas in disgrace, for he was pitifully lacking in the right pirate spirit. No pirate, we felt, would have taken the tale of our petty misdeeds to the Olympian courts for settlement, yet this is what Esau did under cover of a duplicity that aggravated the offence. In one and the same hour he would expound to us the intricacies of the Chinese knot with with many friendly and sensible observations, and tell the shocked Olympians that we had thrown his rose-sticks all over the garden in the manner of javelins. Captain Shark, of the barque Rapacious, would not have acted like this, if it was conceivable that that sinister hero could have turned gardener. Perhaps he would have smitten us sorely with the Dutch hoe, or scalped us with his pruning-knife by means of a neat twist learnt in Western America, but whatever form his revenge might have assumed he would have scorned to betray us to the people who had forgotten how to play. Esau was a sad knave.

And, unlike the Olympians, he had no illusions as to the value of our labours in the garden, treating our generous assistance with the scantiest gratitude, and crediting our enthusiasm with the greater part of Nature's shortcomings. Whenever our horticultural efforts became at all spirited he would start up suddenly from behind a hedge and admonish us as the boy in "Prunella" admonishes the birds. He would not allow us to irrigate the flower-beds by means of a system of canals; he checked, or at least attempted to check, our consumption of fruit, deliciously unripe (has any one noticed that an unripe greengage eaten fresh from the tree is a gladder thing than any ripe fruit?); he would not let us play at executions with the scythe, or at avalanches with the garden-roller. The man's soul was a cabbage, and I fear that he regarded us as a tiresome kind of vermin that he might not destroy.

Nevertheless, as the Olympians liked to see us employed in the garden, he could not wholly refuse our proffered aid, and he would watch our adventures with the garden-hose and the lawn-mower, with his piratical features incarnadined, as it were, by the light of his lurid past. Naturally, water being a good friend of children, to water the garden was the most popular task of all, and as I was the youngest brother it was but rarely that I was privileged to experience that rare delight. To feel the cool rush of the water through fingers hot with play and the comfortable trickle down one's sleeve, to smite a plant with muddy destruction and to hear the cheerful sound made by the torrent in falling on to the soaked lawn—these and their fellow emotions may not be those of adult gardeners, but they are not to be despised. But as I have said, they were not for me, and usually I had to be content with mowing the lawn, an occupation from which I drew a full measure of placid enjoyment.

Age dims our realisation of the emotional significance of our own actions, and it is only by an effort of memory that I can arrive at the philosophy of the contented mower of lawns. I suppose that professional gardeners find the labour monotonous, lacking both the artistic interest of such work as pruning, and the scientific subtleties of cucumber growing; but youth has the precious faculty of finding the extraordinary in the commonplace, and I had only to drag the lawn-mower from its rugged bed among the forks and spades in the tool-house, to embark on a sea of intricate and diverse adventure.

The very appearance of the thing was cheery and companionable, with its hands outstretched to welcome mine, and its coat of green more vivid than any lawn. To seize hold of its smooth handles was like shaking hands with an old friend, and as it rattled over the gravel path it chattered to me in the gruff tones of a genial uncle. Once on the smooth lawn its voice thrilled to song, tremulous and appealing, and filled with the throbbing of great wings. Even now I know no sound that cries of the summer so poignantly as the intermittent song of the lawn-mower heard far off through sunny gardens. And cheered by that song I might drive my chariot, or it might be my plough, where I would. Not for me the stiff brocaded pattern beloved of Esau; I made curves, skirting the shadows of the tall poplars, or cutting the lawn into islands and lagoons. Over the grass-box—or the nose-bag, as we called it—the grass danced like a mist of green flies, and I beheaded the daisies with the zest of a Caligula, pausing sometimes to marvel at those modest blossoms that survived my passage. I marvelled too, with the cold inhumanity of youth, at the injudicious earthworms that tried to stay my progress, and perished for their pains. Sometimes a stray pebble would grate unpleasantly on the blades and waken my lulled senses with a jerk; sometimes I would drive too close to a flower-bed, and munched fragments of pansies and wallflowers would glow amongst the grass in the grass-box.

No doubt a part of my enjoyment lay in the feeding of that natural spirit of destructiveness that present-day Olympians satisfy with frequent gifts of clockwork toys, ingenious mechanisms very proper to be inquired into by young fingers. But there was more in it than that. I liked the smell of the newly cut grass, and I would run my fingers through it and press damp, warm handfuls of it to my face to win the full savour of it. I even liked the more pungent odour of the grass-heap where last week's grass lay drying in the sun. And the effort necessary to drive the worker of wonders across the lawn gave me a pleasant sense of my own sturdiness.

But the fact remains that, with all these reasons, I cannot wholly fathom the true philosophy of lawn-mowing with my adult mind. I have set down all the joys that I remember, but some significant fact, some essential note of enchantment, is missing. What did I think about as I pressed to and fro with my lawn-mower? Sometimes, perhaps, I was a ploughman, guiding vast horses along the crests of mountains, and pausing now and again to examine the treasures that my labour had revealed in the earth, leather bags of guineas and jewelled crowns that sparkled through their mask of clay. Sometimes I might be a charioteer driving a team of mad horses round the circus for Nero's pleasure, or a fireman driving a fire-engine scatheless through bewildered streets. But with all I believe that sometimes I was no more than a little boy, mowing the lawn of a sunny garden, loving the task for its own sake, and inspired by no subtler spirit than that which led Esau to cultivate cabbages with dogged enthusiasm. It would not do to condemn that dishonoured pirate because he saw heaven as a kitchen-garden and regarded flowers as the fond toys of the Olympian dotage. He, too, had his illusions; he, too, while he sowed the seed had visions of an impossible harvest. His ultimate fate eludes my memory, but doubtless he has finished with his husbandry by now. I, too, no longer mow the lawn save when arrayed in fantastic knickerbockers and dream-shod as of yore I trim the grass-plats of sleep with a lawn-mower that sings as birds no longer sing. What the purpose of my youthful labours may have been I do not know. . . . Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus. Perhaps I was already enrolled in the employment agency of destiny as a writer of idle articles.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

A SHAKESPEARE BIBLIOGRAPHY*

THE long-projected has arrived. For many years Mr. William Jaggard, as some of us have been aware, has been putting his inexhaustible patience into the compilation of a complete Shakespeare bibliography, from the earliest days onward—an undertaking, surely, enough to quail the doughtiest. It now lies before us, a handsome, weighty, goodly tome, at the goodly price also of three guineas. Not that it lacks the value. That very thought may be decried, for a book such as this is worth whatever an intending purchaser may feel disposed to pay for it. It defies valuation, because all labours of love and indefatigable zeal are impossible to appraise in terms of Mammon; whatever the price that may be paid for them, there must ever remain the fairest portion over and above all payment, for which no payment can suffice, and which must therefore be a royal gift from man to man. Were we properly framed, for example, we should hold ourselves under an obligation to purchase all books of poetry, and for the very paradoxical reason that no book of poetry can possibly be undertaken for payment or gain. One feels somewhat of the same emotion towards this book of Mr. Jaggard's, for there never was, nor ever could have been, any question of gain in the matter. It could only have been undertaken for something higher than gain, and therefore it can only belong to the things of the spirit.

Let it be clearly understood exactly what is meant. In his Historical Introduction Mr. Jaggard bids us know that this book of his—

> Seeks to be something more than a bibliography—in fact, to be an encyclopædia of Shakespearean information and stage history, or, as Bacon says, the "image of men's wit and knowledge," instantly pointing out all recorded data. . . . It contains over thirty-six thousand distinct entries and references, including many hitherto unrecorded editions, with thousands of illustrative notes and extracts. It gives minute details and available locations of every known issue of Shakespeare's writings (whether written, printed, separate, collective, authentic, attributed, private, public, in or out of print); likewise of every tract, pamphlet, volume, or collection of Shakespearean comment; of each analogue or source, with notes of the passages affected; of every important contemporary or subsequent allusion to, or article on, the dramatist or his productions; of each autograph, genuine or forged; of all engraved Shakespeare portraits; with market values of the rarer entries. Key-references are embodied to all incidental Shakespearean actors, actresses, artists, attributes, bibliographers, blind-type printings, celebrations, centenaries, clubs, collaborators, commemorations, commentators, composers, controversies, critics, editors, engravers, exhibitions, festivals, forgeries, illustrations (pictorial or literary), jubilees, managers, manuscripts, memorials, monuments, printers, prompters, pseudonyms, publishers, societies, theatres, translators, vellum-printings.

Tinker, tailor, plough-boy, apothecary, thief, one feels apt to continue, in irreverent mood. But it is no matter for irreverence. It is a thing profoundly full of awe, the more so when we consider that it has taken "twenty-two years' effort, chiefly in time ill-spared from rest and recreation." "At last," says Mr. Jaggard, "I have reconciled aim with achievement, faith with fulfilment." And thus the work comes into the hands of the reader to use, and also to criticise.

It is not to be expected that the compilation is invulnerable. Indeed, having given it a somewhat vigorous examination, it is possible to say that there are some strange and unaccountable omissions that will be apt to confuse the modern reader. Shakespearean study henceforth will be less and less concerned with the byways and hedges of the matter. Perhaps this is to speak somewhat too hopefully, and certainly such a faith receives a very salutary reprimand from a survey of Mr. Jaggard's pages. For dry-as-dust inquiries that have been profligate in the past over such questions as Shakespeare's Biblical references and indebtednesses, and pious wrangles over what happened to have been Shakespeare's tenets on matters of faith, or even if he held tenets at all, have had their full meed in what has purported to be, but which most emphatically has not been, Shakespearean inquiry, and therefore Mr. Jaggard's pages bear the imprints of the feet of the patient wayfarers along these dusty roads. Nevertheless, one may be forgiven the thought that this kind of "study" belongs to the past. The future will be, or at least most emphatically should be, given up to a study that shall illuminate its subject. For example, one of the questions that remain to receive adequate examination is the dramatic environment that led to the production not only of Shakespeare, but also of his contemporaries in Elizabethan drama. The history of the companies themselves requires fit treatment, not to speak of the conditions of the actual stage. On this latter point much has been written during the past few years, and on going carefully and exhaustively from magazine article to magazine article, tracking the subject from book to book, most of them published not in the ordinary way, but included in the lists of remote American Universities, it must be said, however regretfully, that there are some rather serious omissions in this present bibliography.

To set out a list of such publications would, however, be to miss an opportunity in a thousand. There are few entertainments more complete and absorbing than an aimless wander through a bibliography—unless it be a dictionary or a map. One would have said offhand that there could not possibly be mentioned three kinds of books that were less tinctured with the personal element. Yet that would not be said by any one who had once put the method to the test. Loves and hates have possibly a greater opportunity, because they have to hide their heads behind an uninteresting exterior. Battles leap out of names, and blood and glory sweep through mere nomenclature. It is certainly so in this learned and weighty compilation. For instance, we avoided looking for Dr. Lee's works, thinking that their very fame would

* Shakespeare Bibliography. (The Shakespeare Press, Stratford-on-Avon.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

frustrate inexclusion. Imagine, therefore, the slow and incredulous surprise that came spreading over the features on seeing no list where a somewhat considerable list had been expected. Close examination very naturally bent intimately over the page and discovered the following entry:—"Lee (Sidney Launcelot). See Levi (S. L.)" Perplexity succeeded to amazement; and when Levi was turned to the entry was discovered thus:—"Levi, Sidney L. Lee (Solomon Lazarus)," with a long list following, which we inevitably recognise as Dr. Lee's.

Naturally this is a subject that cannot but arouse and quicken a considerable interest. So a later page is turned, a page that deals with Dr. Lee's book on Shakespeare's "Life." And we find this note appended to the notification of the sixth edition of that work:—"The author says in the preface 'this issue gives him an opportunity of correcting errors,' an opportunity he makes careless use of, seeing that his time-worn blunder that the Jaggard canon was produced in Fleet Street still appears on page 251, although the writer has pointed out the mistake over and over again." A ray of light strikes across the scene, and so recourse is made to Dr. Lee's "Life." It is, of course, a well enough known fact that the printing house that published the First Folio had been established, and was under the direction of William Jaggard, of whom Dr. Lee says, "as the piratical publisher of 'The Passionate Pilgrim' he had long since known the commercial value of Shakespeare's work." Moreover, on earlier pages Dr. Lee had recorded that, with regard to the 1599 edition of "The Passionate Pilgrim," Shakespeare was "much offended with Mr. Jaggard that (altogether unknown to him) presumed to make so bold with his name," since there was but little in the volume that was truly his, and had also spoken of this William Jaggard as "a none too scrupulous publisher." The result of all this is that some three hundred years after another William Jaggard arises in vindication of his namesake, if not his ancestor, with the effect that the sober and prosaic pages of a bibliography have to bear record of thrust and counter-thrust, lunge and tierce.

To strike so human a trait in Mr. Jaggard in so vast a subject is, in a strange way, to feel reassured as to him. Though, in truth, there is no need for such reassurance as this in a work that no Shakespeare scholar can afford to neglect in his future study of the work of one who was lofty in his thought, wide in his sympathy, gentle in his nature, inflexible in his sense of justice, and startling in his unerring intimacy of intuition. It is true—it is, perhaps, unfortunately true—that no such future study can afford to neglect scholarship, if by scholarship be meant research and care and collation of detail with detail. A book that shall strike a new note in the interpretation of the great dramatist should be a rare thing, though not an impossible thing. And yet, to be assured of one's originality one would need to have read such a book as this of Mr. Jaggard's. For this is a day when each man who delves in the Shakespearean field is very jealous of his "claim;" though it is true that such pretensions would have had short shrift in the very Elizabethan age of which he writes. They, at least, were not tender as to plagiarism. They had not invented the word: they had not even invented the idea. What passed at the "Mermaid" was for the use of the first man who could fit it into some work of his. This, however, is a different day—withal a less manly day—and so the worker in the Shakespearean field must not be ignorant of the work of his predecessors. In a word, he must have recourse to this book of Mr. Jaggard; for, assuredly, without it he will indeed be like a man searching in dark archives with no light other than a taper. This bibliography is a blazing torch.

ART

MODERN MEZZOTINTS AT THE REMBRANDT GALLERY

We owe it to Mr. Frank Short to confess that we visited the exhibition of trial proofs of his mezzotints with some apprehension. Speaking generally, the art of mezzotint is not one that has progressed with time. The reason is, generally speaking, that the discovery of processes which have enabled copies (and profits) to be multiplied have at the same time, by hardening the plates, deprived the prints of that softness and delicacy which was their highest attraction. Something is lacking, too, in the mezzotinters themselves. Many of them seem to have no sense of the charm of the great eighteenth-century masters whom they seek to reproduce and interpret. Beautiful lips, expressed by those masters in deft and seemingly shapeless touches, become under the hands of the modern interpreter hard and over-defined; and the fresh loveliness which they recorded so marvellously gets "sicklied o'er with the pale cast" of the modern life of blue-stockings and Suffragette. Visit the Print Room at the British Museum and compare these modern efforts with the works of the Wards, of John Young, of Valentine Green, and half a dozen smaller lights, and the causes of our uneasiness will be clear. But we are bound to confess that we have been agreeably disappointed. Whether because he had a sense of his own limitations or not we cannot say; but Mr. Short has thrown out no challenge to the giants of the eighteenth century—he has occupied ground on which he felt himself at home; and the result is beyond all question a success.

Mr. Short has realised as none of his predecessors have done the possibilities of mezzotint as an interpreter of atmosphere, and in this direction he has achieved not a few triumphs. For his reproductions of some of the best prints from Turner's Liber Studiorum we have reason to be especially grateful. The present generation is familiar with these masterpieces, for the most part in hand impressions from inferior or worn-out plates, and to behold them as Mr. Short has now given them to us will be a revelation to all except a few experts. These were practically the fruit of a challenge from the late Mr. Ruskin; and Mr. Short rose magnificently to the occasion. They have all the light and shade, the depth and mystery, that mark the best of Turner's work, and to study them is a real education in art. But there is plenty also of Mr. Short's work to be seen besides, and nearly all of it shows the same high level of achievement, both in technique and in depth of feeling—we may instance especially "Per Horse-power per hour" and "Nithsdale." He has seized and interpreted wonderfully, too, the spirit and style of that noblest of water-colourists, P. de Windt, in "A Woody Landscape" and others, which almost suggest, through their wonderfully truthful values, the very colour of the master; and the same may be said of his fine "Sunset on the Beach" after Copley Fielding. In him Watts, too, finds a generous and exact interpreter. If any justification were needed for the step taken not long since in electing Mr. Short to the membership of the Royal Academy, this exhibition would furnish it in ample measure.

THE NEW WATER-COLOUR SOCIETY

An hour spent at the Carlton Galleries in Pall-Mall Place, where the New Society of Water-colour Painters is holding its fourth exhibition, should be a pleasant one to the visitor. It is an interesting exhibition. Nearly all the pictures are landscapes on a comparatively small scale, and there is plenty of good work among them. Best of all—with one or two exceptions—it is legitimate water-colour painting, and one can only hope that the members will not feel tempted to follow the example set by Mr. Bennett's "Cogitation." There are a great many pictures, and a certain number are of necessity placed in a very indifferent light. It is only possible here to mention two or three. The strongest and finest work exhibited is that of Mr. Gerald Ackermann, whose "On the Common," "Carling Turf," and "The Old Oak"—broadly handled somewhat in the David Cox manner—are the antithesis of the charmingly delicate "Netley Hospital" and others by Mr. T. Butler-Stoney—whose fault, however, is over-flatness. Mr. A. Carruthers-Gould's "Road to the Quarry" is a piece of good, bold work. Mr. Tatton Winter is represented by several sensitive landscapes full of wind and weather; while in the first room hangs a very beautiful water-colour—a dexterous treatment of figures and wet sand—by Mr. Vignoles Fisher.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE BAILLIE GALLERY

One can hardly fail to be interested in Mr. James Pryde's pictures at the Baillie Gallery. In nearly all there is some quality—something in which one recognises at once the artist hand. But the qualities which go to the making of a real work of art are several, and they are not all present in any one of these pictures. Mr. Pryde's treatment of colour errs, strangely enough, between the two extremes of muddiness and crudity. He inclines to the first, but the second is apparent in "The Green Wave" and "The Flying Dutchman." On the other hand, the technique, the management of the paint—in "The Laundry," "The Rehearsal," and the suggested figures in the foreground of "The Fight," for instance—is good enough to leave one wondering why it is that these pictures seem to have stopped where one would have wished them to begin. "The Betrothal," with its incomprehensible sky, is perhaps the one exception.

Mr. Edgar Seligman's paintings in the adjoining room are less interesting. Their subjects are taken from Seville, Alcala, &c., and are brightly and gaily painted but somewhat theatrical in colour.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By Lancelot Lawton

THE NEW ERA IN CHINA

Article II.—Behind the Walls of the Forbidden City

The Chinese situation has ever been characterised by lightning changes and evident contradictions. Frequently indications have pointed to the beginning in earnest of serious and far-reaching reform. No sooner were all authorities agreed that an awakening had been accomplished than the Vermilion Pencil sent forth its reactionary edict from behind the walls of the Forbidden City. And China, having opened wide her eyes and gazed in wonderment, as it were, at the world of progress around her, closed them again and lapsed into sound slumber. A little later, disturbed by makehaste reformers knocking loudly and insistently at her portals, she yawned, and was aroused once more, but only, as before, to stare with half amusement, half interest at her surroundings, and then to resume the sleep of ages. Again and again has this process been repeated, but each time that China has opened her eyes she has seen something new and has profited. At last there is overwhelming evidence to show that she has risen refreshed from her couch, or, to speak with greater regard to accuracy, from the tomb of her past glories, and it is safe to assume that she will not seek repose again until a cycle, or perhaps many cycles, of Cathay have passed away.

But it must not be imagined that China is wide awake. She is still half awake, half asleep, groping her way with faltering steps, the while, with rude glare, her tortuous path is illuminated by the fierce light of Western civilisation. And among the Powers who represent this civilisation there is not one disinterested enough to take her hand and lead her gently to her goal. Rather do these Powers seek to place obstacles in her progress that she may stumble and give them an opportunity of falling upon her and robbing her of all the riches that she has hoarded beneath her pillow throughout the centuries of slumber. While it may be said that the State as such is only partially awake, it can with truth be declared that the masses are not only wholly awake, but that with spirited energy and sturdy purpose they have begun the work of the day. The opium habit is being courageously stamped out; foot-binding is no longer a cherished custom; the queue is condemned and only waits to be executed; there is a positive hunger for education throughout the land; and patriotism is the dominant note of popular sentiment. There are clear signs that in their eager desire to preserve China from disintegration the masses, imbued as they are with the national spirit, will enter upon an open conflict with the dynasty. The pressure recently exercised by Russia and Japan has everywhere aroused deep and bitter feelings of resentment. Rumours have been assiduously circulated far and wide that the Powers were agreed upon an early partition of the Empire, and the members of the National Assembly are eagerly clamouring for an extra session so as to enable them to discuss, among other topics, the foreign relations and defences of the country.

Meanwhile in reality the fate of China is being decided in Peking, where an interesting drama, full of deep-laid plot and elaborate intrigue, is gradually unfolding. After the lapse of only a few years history is repeating itself with marvellous accuracy. Once more feminine influence is making a brave bid for the supreme power. To appreciate thoroughly the situation which has arisen it is necessary to bear in mind some of the principal events of the late reign. The Emperor, it will be recalled, had been won over to the side of the advanced reformers, of whom the famous Kang Yu-wei was a prominent leader. Swiftly the Imperial policy was translated into a remarkable series of edicts which declared boldly for the immediate adoption of Western ways and institutions. These edicts led up to the never-to-be-forgotten coup d'état of 1898. The Dowager-Empress, seizing her opportunity, summoned troops to the capital, placed the Emperor in captivity, and arrogated to herself the supreme power.

The Boxer rising was the sequel. So salutary was the lesson administered to China on this occasion that the Empress-Dowager paused to reflect, with the result that she, too, turned reformer, and it was due alone to her initiative that practical steps were taken with the object of introducing Constitutional Government. Amid an atmosphere charged with treachery this masterful woman controlled the destinies of China for ten years. In 1908 the Emperor lay upon his death-bed, and to provide for the succession a solemn Council was convened. Powerful statesmen, including Yuan Shih-kai and Prince Ching, urged that the time had arrived for a return to direct lineal succession in accordance with the laws of the dynasty. The Empress-Dowager would not listen to thoir advice. She wished to maintain her power unimpaired, and for this purpose it was necessary that a puppet should be nominated. Her strong will overcame all opposition, and the infant in arms, Prince Pu Yi, was chosen to be the Son of Heaven. Thereupon the Empress-Dowager constituted herself the Empress Grand Dowager, and the Emperor's widow, Lung Yu, became the Dowager-Empress. Following with amazing suddenness upon the demise of the nominal Sovereign came the strange tragedy of the Grand Empress Dowager's death, a tragedy surrounded by suspicious circumstances and veiled with that mystic secrecy which enshrouds Oriental life.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Before she passed away, however, the Empress appointed as Regent Prince Chun, the father of the infant Emperor. But, in her inflexible will, she provided that in all questions of importance he must consult the Empress-Dowager, Lung Yu, and act strictly in accordance with her directions. History will doubtless assign to the late Empress a place not only among illustrious women, but among illustrious rulers. To this day her policy survives in China. In her own wonderful personality she made feminine influence supreme in a land where, generally speaking, her sex are enslaved; and, moreover, she provided that after her departure from the scene feminine influence should continue to hold sway. At the present moment it is clear that the Regent is completely under the domination of the Empress-Dowager. It is she who has the deciding voice in all questions vitally affecting the welfare of the State. Again and again it has been suggested that Yuan Shih-kai should be recalled. But the Empress-Dowager, fearing the power of this great reformer, has steadfastly refused her consent. By sheer force of character she has made herself the central figure in the State, and all who seek advancement must pay her court. Only recently she gave a reception to eleven of the Legation ladies. It is recorded that the infant-Emperor, clad in mandarin robes, was present, and that he "stared in astonishment at the strange visitors."

But it must not be imagined that the Empress has the field all to herself. She has indeed a formidable rival—one all the more dangerous because of her own sex. This rival is none other than the wife of the Regent. From all accounts that have passed without the Forbidden City it would appear that the relations between these exalted ladies are frankly strained. To employ the phraseology of the West, one would be compelled to say that they are not on speaking terms. Naturally Princess Chun exhorts her husband to adopt a firm policy with the object of relegating the Dowager-Empress to the background. The Regent, however, keeps ever in mind the coup d'état of the last reign, and, though a man filled with worthy intention, is quite ready to sacrifice his patriotic principles in the cause of domestic peace. As the mother of the child-Emperor and the wife of the Regent, Princess Chun considers herself entitled to exert authority. On the other hand, the Dowager-Empress has in her favour all the points that belong to possession. She was a staunch supporter of her aunt, the late Dowager-Empress, who has not only handed down to her power, but, apparently, stern methods of enforcing power. Fears have been expressed that so soon as she considers circumstances favourable she will follow the precedent of the last reign and make a sudden attempt to constitute herself both Regent and Ruler. Already two camps are gradually shaping themselves, and both the Empress and Princess Chun are drawing to their rival banners a considerable number of influential adherents.

It would seem that, amid the battle of the ladies, the Regent himself is more or less a negligible quantity. Princess Chun can only triumph by inducing him to show more courage than has hitherto characterised his relations with the Empress. For it is impossible to conceive that Princess Chun, were she so disposed, could elbow her own husband out of the Regency. Her power can only be reflected in his personality, and, as we have already seen, he is ill-equipped for a struggle with the strong and astute woman who has so worthily succeeded the late Empress-Dowager. In spite of the subterranean intrigue of feminine factions which is undermining the foundations of the Empire, edicts still continue to be issued solemnly commanding the people to 'tremble and obey"! Recently there have not been wanting feeble signs that the Regent is summoning up courage on paper by a free use of the Vermilion Pencil. In a panegyric on the Manchu Dynasty he has gone out of his way to refer to "the Emperor's ceaseless labour spent in gaining a peaceful home for the people, regardless of the inclemency of the weather, nor heeding their own health and interest." While plots and counter-plots are being hatched within the sacred precincts of the Palace the forces of progress are lapping up to the very walls of the Forbidden City itself. Peking now possesses fine buildings of Western architecture, foreign shops with fashionable displays; well-paved streets and even boulevards and an electric light supply. And Manchu ladies of high degree have emerged from their isolation to take afternoon tea with cream-buns at the European hotel. The craze to be up to date has seized upon all classes of the population. Few statesmen any longer oppose reform, but all are desirous of acquiring power. And the disposal of power rests with the rival ladies of Royal rank who are quarrelling in the seclusion of their palaces. Perhaps ere long the people will settle the issue for themselves and place a man upon the throne.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

So soon as a serious attempt is made to elaborate a machinery for giving effect to the idea of closer Imperial unity difficulties that are for the moment of an insuperable character begin to manifest themselves. Already two definite projects have been presented to the Imperial Conference, and neither has met with approval. Sir Joseph Ward suggested the formation of what he termed an "Imperial Parliament of Defence," to be advisory to the Imperial Government. This body was to consist of representatives of Great Britain and of the overseas Dominions elected on the basis of one member for each 200,000 of the population. "To the Imperial Parliament of Defence," declared Sir Joseph Ward, "should be transferred exclusively those matters common to the whole Empire, including questions involving peace or war, treaties, foreign relations generally, Imperial defence, and the providing of revenues for the foregoing purposes. For the first ten years after its election this Parliament of Defence should have no power of taxation, but the amount payable by each of the overseas Dominions should be taken as a debt due by them.'

While Sir Joseph Ward achieved what was doubtless his main purpose—the stimulation of a useful discussion—his scheme possessed many obvious objections, and was rightly judged to be impracticable. Free and open debate on delicate issues affecting foreign policy and defence, by an unwieldy Council or Parliament of some three hundred members, would hamper, if it did not positively menace, the true interests of the Empire. Such an innovation would certainly be regarded by our friends and allies among the nations with stark amazement. Finally, against Sir Joseph Ward's scheme there was the cardinal objection that upon the Dominions expenditure might be imposed arbitrarily of which they might not approve, but which they were compelled to meet by taxation.

The Government on their side have brought forward a project that a Standing Committee of the Imperial Conference should be formed consisting of the Secretary of State, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the Permanent Under-Secretary, the High Commissioners, or representatives of the different Dominions, and a representative of Newfoundland. It is to be distinctly understood that a Committee of this composition shall be merely advisory and not executive. When it comes down to a discussion of detail the Premiers appear to hold to the view that change is unadvisable. Considerable difference of opinion exists concerning the status of the High Commissioners. For example, Sir Joseph Ward contends that as they are frequently asked by their Governments to obtain information preparatory to a decision being arrived at in certain matters their position on a Standing Committee would be an embarrassing one. Sir Wilfrid Laurier frankly opposes change, and in an attempt to define the status of the High Commissioners, declares them to be "not only the representatives of autonomous Governments to the Government of Great Britain and the whole British people, but also confidential agents." Mr. Fisher expresses the opinion that the duties and functions of High Commissioners are undefined, while Mr. Malan says that the High Commissioners are not political agents, but business representatives, and believes that their position as such would be unduly interfered with if they had to act as semi-political agents with the duty of meeting the Secretary of State to discuss matters of high politics. Briefly, the objections of the Colonies to the project appear to be twofold:

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

1. That the High Commissioners being at present the confidential agents of their Governments are in a position, whenever necessary, to advocate the case for their Governments, whereas on a Standing Committee their capacity would be consultative. 2. That the interests of any single Colony could not be satisfactorily submitted to a committee consisting of representatives from all the Colonies. While the Conference is straining hard to serve in a practical manner the cause of Imperial unity, singularly enough it so happens that all the proposals brought forward up to the present reveal on discussion insurmountable obstacles. Naturally the Colonies are exceedingly jealous of their privileges as self-governing nations. They wish their High Commissioners to voice the interests of self-governing nations in the truest meaning of the term, and are determined to avoid any measure likely to create a consultative body that, in a general and loose sense, may be taken as speaking for and representing the Empire as a whole. To devise a machinery that will meet their wishes in this respect, and at the same time supply the urgent need for shaping a common foreign and defence policy, calls for extraordinary qualities of statesmanship – the qualities of Imperial statesmanship. So far, as I have already shown, attempts to solve the problem have only produced projects of a somewhat rigid kind, and these projects the Colonies, rightly or wrongly, regard as exhibiting a tendency to group them altogether in haphazard fashion, thus threatening their fundamental privileges as "independent nations within an Empire."

It is extremely unlikely that the question will be settled satisfactorily at this Conference. But, nevertheless, the Assembly will be memorable if only for the reason that Colonial Missions have been admitted to the secret deliberations of the Defence Committee. They will leave this country fully informed in regard to the inner workings of Imperial Foreign Policy and Imperial Strategy, and in the future will be in a position to interchange views with the home Government on those highly important subjects. It is beyond all doubt that the Conference chamber holds no traitor to the cause of Imperial Unity, but the danger is present that from what must necessarily involve little more than tentative deliberation the false impression may be created that the Mother Country seeks to tighten her hold over the individual liberties of the Daughter States. Such a supposition is preposterous, and ill accords with the affectionate loyalty that reposes in the hearts of every one of his Majesty's subjects in the Dominions beyond the seas.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

NUMBERLESS companies make their appearance, but hardly any are subscribed. Underwriters are now getting chock-full of scrip which they cannot dispose of. Some of the issues have, of course, been fairly sound concerns, but the majority of the companies that make their appearance to-day are not of any value whatever. However, it is miserable work perpetually disparaging everything, and it is, therefore, with great pleasure that I call attention to the Slazenger Company, which was a sound industrial issue on first-class lines. The success that attended the offer showed that the public are perfectly well aware of what is good and what is bad. We are always fond of sneering at the public, but it appears that in matters of finance they are not such fools as the promoters think them to be. Slazengers went well, and it deserved its success. The Baring Brothers' issue of Oregon Bonds, guaranteed as it was by the Union Pacific Railway and issued at a reasonable price, was also a success, and I can strongly recommend the securities as a thoroughly sound investment. The British Canadian Lumber Company have offered 4,000,000 6 per cent. preference shares, and indulged in the vicious habit of giving away common stock in the proportion of one share for every 100 preference shares. There is only one report on the property, and although Canadian lumber is no doubt profitable, the present concern must be regarded as a speculation pure and simple.

The Consolidated Gas Electric Light and Power Company of Baltimore asked us to buy a million dollars 4½ per cent. mortgage bonds at 8s. 9d. The business is progressive, and the margin of past profits appears small, but the bonds appear reasonably well secured and are a fair investment. The Malaysian Rubber Company is asking the public to subscribe for shares at £2 premium, a quite preposterous figure in view of the present condition of the Rubber Market. At par the shares would have been a reasonable gamble. The £2 premium was simply stupid. The underwriters probably would have to take the lot. A tin company also asked for money, but these tin companies are great gambles, and up to the present can hardly be said to have been conspicuous successes. The Fishguard Castle Estate is a very modest concern. It appears desirous of selling 1,200 5 per cent. debentures at £25 a-piece. Those who purchase these have the option of exchanging them for bungalows or land sites. It is a curious little company, with Earl Russell as the chairman. Curtis, Gardner and Co. are also asking the public to underwrite their Woldsea Freehold Town Planning Syndicate, with Lord Grimthorpe as chairman. It is somewhat unusual to scatter underwriting contracts broadcast, and it does not improve my opinion of the concern, with which I am sorry to see Lord Grimthorpe's name associated.

MONEY.—The Money position has been complicated by a demand from Brazil, and it would appear possible that a great deal of the gold that France is sending us in payment of her foodstuffs may be exported to the Amazon to hold up the rubber position. There is therefore no certainty that the Bank Rate will be reduced. On the contrary, it is probable that we shall see a 3 per cent. Rate all through the summer.

FOREIGNERS.—Paris again sends over support for her favourite Russians, and whenever there is the slightest unsteadiness this market firmed up. I do not think we shall see any big rise, but we are not likely to see a fall. The Peru Market looks distinctly weak and has been dribbling away almost every day. It will probably fall another point or two, for there is a large bull account in Perus.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

HOME RAILS.—Home Railways have taken on a new lease of life, and, whether it is the near approach of the holidays or the large traffic returns, it is quite certain that the Stock Exchange is again buying all the shares. I say the Stock Exchange, because I do not think that the public has come into this rise at all. There is a certain clique in the House that, having been bears for many years, has now turned round and is to-day just as enthusiastic as it was once despondent. The increased traffic on the heavy lines is very remarkable, and must result in a reasonable advance in dividends. At the same time it is necessary to warn my readers to be careful not to gamble in Home Rails. If they buy them they should buy for investment, for as sure as a large bull account is created so surely will the money-lenders shake out the bulls and force them to lose their money. As an investment Home Rails are in front rank, but I am chary of advising them as a speculation.

YANKEES.—The event of the week has, of course, been the decision in the tobacco case. The politician in the United States plays to the gallery, and although the big bankers pretend that they do not like State interference with financial affairs, they have long since taken the measure of Congress, and they do not care one rap for their decisions. This they showed most conclusively on Tuesday morning by booming up American Rails and putting Canada Pacifics to 247½. Wall Street was closed, and the buying orders came through from the big banks who were operating in London. I think we are certain to see a reaction, as the last thing desired is unlimited speculation. The harvest in the United States looks like being a record, and latest advices are that there is to be a big autumn boom in Yankee Rails. Atchisons have been a great favourite during the past fortnight, as they are to be dealt in on the Paris Bourse, and they will practically be the first ordinary share of an American railway that has thus been honoured. If the American financier can once get the thin end of the wedge into this market, and thus tap the huge supply of French gold, he will be able to unload at a gigantic profit.

RUBBER.—There is nothing to be said for the Rubber Market except that it is flatter than ever. The wildest stories are going about with regard to the position in raw rubber. What will happen no one knows. Personally I think that the bottom has been reached. There has been wild speculation for the rise by people who were quite unable to carry their stocks, and they are being relentlessly squeezed out. The trouble is that it may react upon Brazil and cause financial disaster in Para and Manaos. This is not the moment to buy rubber shares. The dealers are confident that Linggis will go to 35s. But of course if the price of rubber falls, the value of all the rubber shares must fall also, for if rubber continues low in price, the profits for 1911 will be enormously reduced. The Rubber Syndicate in Para seems to have completely failed to effect its object. There are dozens of rubber companies ready to come out, but none of them dare face a slumping market. In this they are quite wise.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir Market is dull but steady. We are promised a record production for the month of May, and I understand that every effort is to be made to continue this production with the idea of getting the public again interested in the Kaffir Market. Whether the magnates will succeed in doing this is somewhat doubtful. But perhaps two or three months of records will change the public view.

RHODESIANS.—The long-talked of pooling agreement is now complete, and all the Rhodesian houses have promised faithfully not to sell and to keep the market steady for the next six months. The leading shares will therefore be supported, and we have already seen a slight rise in Giants, Rhodesian Exploration, and Shamvas. If the Rhodesian magnates can only refrain from ratting all will be well. The mines are not doing badly, and the jobbers, when they are assured of loyalty on the part of the big houses, could easily get the public in.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Marconis are very much to the front now in the miscellaneous market; but it is a dangerous stock to buy, and I should be inclined to advise caution, although I am told that the company has had a very good year. The Nitrate reports that are now coming out are most of them good, and those who hold Nitrate shares should certainly not sell, as this market might improve.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Silver Shamrock. By Captain Henry Curties. Greening and Co. 6s.

The Devil in Solution. By William Caine. Illustrated by George Morrow. Greening and Co. 6s.

The Downfall of the Gods. By Sir Hugh Clifford, K.C.M.G. John Murray. 6s.

In Fancy's Mirror. By Violet A. Simpson. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

The Sea-Sphinx. By Marshall N. Goold, M.A. George Allen and Co. 5s. net.

EDUCATIONAL

A New Geometry. By W. M. Baker, M.A., and A. A. Bourne, M.A. G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d.

Disturbing Elements in the Study and Teaching of Political Economy. By James Bonar, M.A. The Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, U.S.A. $1.

A Mashona Dictionary, with Notes on the Grammar of the Mashona Language commonly called Chiswina. Compiled at St. Augustine's Mission, Penhalonga. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.

Elementary Regional Geography: Europe and the Mediterranean Region. By J. B. Reynolds, B.A. Illustrated. A. and C. Black. 1s. 4d.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Memoirs and Memories. By Mrs. C. W. Earle. With Portraits. Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

The Nelsons of Burnham Thorpe: A Record of a Norfolk Family compiled from Unpublished Letters and Notebooks, 1787-1842. By M. Eyre Matcham. Illustrated. John Lane. 16s. net.

PERIODICALS

Studi Critici di Filologia e Glottologia, Naples; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; La Grande Revue; Bookseller; Good Health; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Fortnightly Review; La Licorne, Antwerp; Publishers' Circular; Revue Bleue; Everybody's Story Magazine; Sunday at Home; Friendly Greetings; Woman's Magazine; Boy's Own; Harper's Magazine; Nineteenth Century and After; Cambridge University Reporter; The Sphere, Coronation Number, 2s. 6d.; Illustrated London News, Coronation Number, 2s. 6d.

FIVE LECTURES
by
MRS. ANNIE BESANT
(President of the Theosophical Society),
QUEEN'S HALL, LANGHAM PLACE, W.
(Sole Lessees—Messrs. Chappell & Co., Ltd.).

SUBJECT:
THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE.
On Sunday Evenings:

June 11. Impending Physical Changes.
,, 18. The Growth of a World-Religion.
,, 25. The Coming of a World-Teacher.
July 2. Social Problems: Self-Sacrifice or Revolution?
,, 9. Religious Problems: Dogmatism or Mysticism?

At 7 p.m. promptly.

Seats—Numbered and Reserved, 5s., 3s., 2s. Admission 1s. and 6d., and Free. Apply to the Theosophical Publishing Society, 161, New Bond Street, London, W.; or the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, W.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria S reet, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

"THE BOOK MONTHLY."

The May "Book Monthly," Sixpence net, contains an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the well-known novelist. It also has various other articles of a literary interest, and all the news about the new books. Its illustrations are an engaging feature as usual, and, in fine, the May "Book Monthly" is worth getting. The publishers are Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send a specimen copy free on application.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During July & August.	Southampton, Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

No. 2040 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JUNE 10, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

'SWIFT'

Books that Compel

THE PARTY SYSTEM. By Hilaire Belloc and Cecil Chesterton. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
Every man and woman in England should read this searching indictment of Parliamentary shams. "Says in plain English what everybody in touch with reality thinks."—The Star.
Lord Hugh Cecil, in a recent debate in the House of Commons, said: "The very striking book called 'The Party System' . . . contained some great truths."
The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour, in the same debate, referred to this book as follows: "I read the first two pages of it, and it is that which has given me an appetite for reading the remainder."

PARISIAN PORTRAITS. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
This is an entirely new work by one of the most striking literary figures of our time. Mr. Grierson is at the present moment being hailed in America as a genius of extraordinary powers.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 6s. net.
Vivid memories of Lincoln's country before the Civil War. "With a wonderful touch Mr. Grierson depicts scene after scene . . . with bold, impressive strokes."—Daily Telegraph.

MODERN MYSTICISM. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
Original, incisive, subtle, acute. MAURICE MAETERLINCK says:—". . . Full of thoughts of the very highest order."

THE CELTIC TEMPERAMENT. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
The late Professor WILLIAM JAMES said:—"I find 'The Celtic Temperament' charming and full of wisdom." The Glasgow Herald says:—"A remarkable book by a remarkable man."

LONELY ENGLAND. By Maude Goldring. With Three Coloured Illustrations and several Pen and Ink Sketches by Agnes Pike. Cloth, 5s. net.
Suggests, with light and subtle power, that to-day, as ever, fairyland lurks in all the neglected countryside. Songs and verses are scattered about, and the wind of the heath blows through all the book.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A DON. By G. F. Abbot. Cloth, 5s. net.
A highly diverting and thought-provoking presentment of two radically opposed intellectual forces at work in England to-day.

EIGHT CENTURIES OF PORTUGUESE MONARCHY. By Bragança Cunha. Demy 8vo., 15 Pencil Portraits, 15s. net.
This book reveals the series of causes, both political and social, which have brought Portugal to its present condition and affected the character of the people.

TRIUMPHANT VULGARITY. By Charles J. Whitby, M.D. 3s. 6d. net.
This book records a disillusioned impression of modernity. It is a rebuke to optimists and a warning to dreamers. The author exposes the morbidity of exaggerated sympathy, and adumbrates the formation of a new Secret Order for the promotion of ideal ends.

THE RECTOR OF ST. JACOBS. By Senex Rusticanus. 6s.
This is the first work of one who will shortly enter his eightieth year. But the book is not only a "prodigy of age," it is a searching study of thought, motive, and action, and the types of character so vividly depicted are in our midst to-day.

SOME NEIGHBOURS: Stories, Sketches, and Studies. By Charles Granville. 2nd Edition. 6s.
Mr. Granville writes with "sympathy and charm," and this, his latest book, is "full of clever characterisation" and that quality of humour "which perceives the sense of tears in human things." "His art is so sure that he puts a world of life and reality into a few pages."

THE MAIDS' COMEDY. A Chivalric Romance in Thirteen Chapters. 3s. 6d. net.

CIVIL WAR. A Play in Four Acts by Ashley Dukes. 2s. net.
This play is not in any sense imitative of Mr. Bernard Shaw. It is at once effective and original. The portrait of life in a colony of revolutionists alone should make it something of a dramatic curiosity.

SIR EDWARD. By a Fellow of the Literary Society. Cloth, 1s. net.
An Æsopian biography. . . . An irresistible satire on the drifting ideas and false ideals of a muddled civilisation . . . exquisitely humorous.

Send for complete Prospectus of "Books that Compel."

LONDON: STEPHEN SWIFT
10, John Street, Adelphi

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE. POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

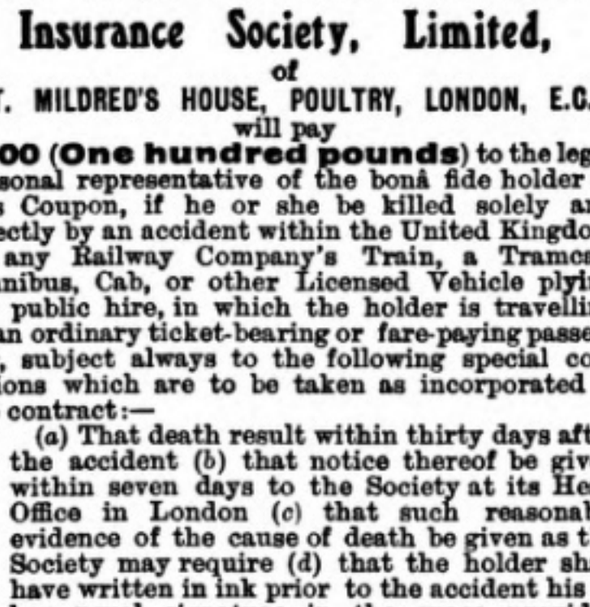
MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.



The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

The best Writing Ink for modern office use
Ask your Stationer for it.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL. — An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions. — For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

Catalogue No. 378.
JUNE SUPPLEMENT TO GLAISHER'S CATALOGUE
Of Popular and Attractive Books
at Cheap Remainder Prices.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON,
(and at 14, George Street, Croydon).
The books are on view at both addresses.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d. for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Book-finder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific MSS. carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science). Translations from French and German.

GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

THE JUNE
BOOK MONTHLY
is a Good Number for the Coronation and it costs 6d.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Talk of a Literary Sort which you may Pass Round the Coronation Dinner-table.
GENTLEMEN! THE LADIES! What Every Woman Likes in the Novels she Reads.—By Amy Croft.
WHAT THE CITY MAN READS. A Passing Study in Newspapers, Books and Mixed Human Nature.—By George Sampson.
A SONG OF THE SHIRT. On the Note "Why dont Working Women Read More?"—By Priscilla E. Moulder.
THE WILL AND THE WAY. Strange Things about the Last Testaments of Notable Authors.—By W. Bailey Kempling.
A LONDON LETTER. A Salt Sea Voyage and some Bookish Discoveries.—By the Editor.
COPYRIGHT—AND WRONG. New Laws in the Making and a Dispatch from Canada.
CORONATION JUNE. Novels to be Read while you Wait for the Royal Show.—By C. E. Lawrence.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of May, with a Reviewing Commentary.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some June Reviews and Magazines.
Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,
Stationer's Hall Court, London.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	703
The Stars and Earth	704
Mr. Bernard Shaw at Cambridge	704
Togo and Nogi	705
The Story of a Book—I.	706
Reviews:—
The Middle Ages	708
Lights of Yesterday	709
An American on India	710
The Family of Sir Francis Drake	711
The Autocrat at the River-side	712
The Rule of Health	713
Shorter Reviews	713
Fiction	715
Gabriel D'Annunzio	715
The Mystery of Shakespeare's London Life—I.	717
Religious Instruction in India: a Political Danger	718
A Poem of Japan	719
The Theatre	721
Music	724
Art	725
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	725
In the Temple of Mammon	728
Correspondence	729
Books Received	730

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

PREPARATIONS for the approaching Coronation are so energetic that, as Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop humorously observes, many of London's famous buildings look as if they were being packed up carefully for a long journey. The neighbourhood of Westminster Abbey is transformed; at Hyde Park Corner a barrier is being erected across the road; St. George's Hospital appears as though bandaged after a severe operation; and we imagine that if "Maximus Sabellius," who protested so energetically against the desecration of London in our last issue, takes another tour of the route, his protests will be redoubled. It is well, however, that so historically important an event should be celebrated, and we note with pleasure that the Duke of Norfolk, with the approval of the King, has authorised Mr. H. Farnham Burke to prepare a record of the forthcoming Coronation, a companion work, as it were, to the one he successfully undertook in connection with the Coronation of King Edward VII. and Queen Alexandra. The volume will contain approximately two hundred pages of historical matter and twenty elaborate illustrations, and will be issued by Messrs. McCorquodale and Co. at the price of four guineas. Meanwhile, amid all the inevitable confusion and the sudden heat which has enveloped the country, the King is taking his usual thorough interest in social and military affairs. He paid a surprise visit to Aldershot, and spent the day in the broiling sun watching the evolutions of various troops—a day which most people with opportunities of leisure would have preferred to spend in idleness.

When journals which may be regarded as national institutions and pillars of the Empire devote whole columns, and even lengthy leading articles, to the exposition of so uncontroversial a subject as the heat, we may surmise that something unusual is happening in the way of temperature. We do not propose to discuss the reasons for this heat-wave—by the time these words are in print it may have vanished, and every daily paper has its own theory; but it is interesting to note our dependence on Nature's vagaries. A few weeks more of this brilliant sunshine, and politics would be forgotten; let the mercury creep higher in our thermometers by a few degrees, and the importance of keeping cool would rank above the importance of being earnest on any other matter. Conventions are set aside even as it is; even the conservative Englishman appears arrayed in "whites" along Piccadilly—route sacred to sombre masculine fashion for a hundred years!—and in offices devoted to commerce, finance, and literature the shirt-sleeves and light wear suggest the tennis-court. Nature is at the wheel; at her nod we defy fashion, change our diet, shirk our duties, and upset the placid course of ordinary life until we find ourselves more in harmony with the altered environment. Not yet—save in one or two solitary Soho byways—have we reached the stage of the tall shrubs on the pavement and the little friendly café tables so familiar, and so grateful to our eyes, on the other side of the Channel; but it is safe to assert that if the weather of the past week or two remained unbroken for a month or six weeks, the City Fathers would come round to the French notion of comfort in hot periods, and would be seen sipping their iced coffee or cider in the full glare of publicity. Till then, we have our meals in ovens to the sinister humming of electric fans.

The question of the expurgation from literary work of paragraphs, poems, and matter in general which might "disturb the delicate sensibilities" of various people is amusingly touched upon in a couple of letters which we print in the present issue of THE ACADEMY. It is always a large question, fertile in discussion, and it is one which might with advantage be aired at the present day, when so much that is of debatable benefit is published in the name of Art. Expurgation is, of course, in one sense an injustice to a translated work; the author whose pages are doomed to be mutilated hardly obtains a fair representation whereby he may be impartially judged by the critics—and the standards—of another country. All difficulty would be at an end if the volumes containing such passages fell only into the hands of the critics; but when, in the nature of things, a book is sold to whomsoever chooses to buy it, "concessions to Mrs. Grundy" seem inevitable. The danger is that in our revolt from the "prunes and prisms" of early and mid-Victorian days we swing the pendulum too far in the opposite direction. It is no easy matter to hold the balance true between the hide-bound propriety, the comfortable "properness" of the past and that degree of outspokenness which shall result in good both to Art and to those whom it influences. The exploitation of horror for horror's sake, of secret evils for the sake of the prurient, is absolutely opposed to the cause of Art and to its progress, and the difficulty is, when an artist in revolt takes up pen or brush, to determine his position and the effect of his work. We shall be pleased to receive any well-considered letters from readers who may be interested in this important subject.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE STARS AND EARTH

"When," said the Stars to the Earth, "will your winds have done moaning?
When will they rest from their wrath and their dreary complaint?
And the voice of your waters have ended the dirge's intoning?
Will your children for ever be crying, or loudly or faint?"

"We are weary," they said, "of the sound of your wailing,
Rending our silence with sobs and unrestful exclaim;
Little we welcomed your birth and your life unavailing,
Little we love the rude noise of your failure and blame!"

"Know," said the Stars to the Earth, "e'er you came with your sighing,
In the wide firmament round there was nothing amiss;
Wrapt in a silence serene, with our guidance complying,
In peace, like our ages, profound, we dreamed on, and in bliss."

"Yea!" said the Earth to the Stars, "Ye are calm in your duty,
Slumbrous and silent ye wend in your motions and ways,
Nightly I watch and revere, and I muse on your beauty;
Ye are the Early Created, the Ancient of Days!"

"Yet," said the Earth to the Stars, "do ye deem I would borrow
Your peace, or would sleep and be silent for ever as ye?
Think ye I faint and am wan for my children's long sorrow,
Or tire of the wail of my wind and the moan of my sea?

Nay, I rejoice and am glad, and my strength is unbroken,
Great is my pride in the life and the strife that I bear!
Ye are but old and asleep, but my pain is the token
That I am full young and alive; not a pang would I spare!

"Know," said the Earth to the Stars, "when the cycles are finished,
Ye shall be faint and decay in your silence supreme,
But I shall be perfect and stay with my strength undiminished;
I live for a longing I have, and rejoice for a dream!

Like corn 'neath the scythe, like my armies that died 'neath the sabre,
Ye shall be senseless and cold as an impotent clod,
While I bear the noble of soul and the splendid in labour
And over me hovers the flag of the Kingdom of God!"

D. M.

MR. BERNARD SHAW AT CAMBRIDGE

In another column we print a letter from the President of the Cambridge Society of Heretics. The writer, it will be observed, takes exception to our article in last week's issue of The Academy based on the report of a lecture purporting to have been delivered by Mr. Shaw before his Society.

We have referred to the Cambridge Review of the 1st instant, which, Mr. Ogden states, discloses the "official attitude of the University" as to Mr. Shaw's "brilliant" and "inspiring" address. Unfortunately the carefully edited notice in the Review is neither "brilliant" nor "inspiring." It consists of some two hundred words, occupying twenty-two lines. With the exception of the remarkable suggestion, couched in doubtful grammar, as follows:

> If we once realise that God is not omnipotent, but that it is our duty to help Him make himself, we shall have a religion again, and that a native-born religion, the official two hundred words represent a discourse which might have been delivered by the Reverend Doctor Dry-as-dust.

But what says Mr. Shaw himself? Telegraphing to the Daily Express, in answer to the inquiry whether he had used the expression, "Christ was a failure," Mr. Shaw used these words:—

> Have not seen report, but the fact you mention is sufficiently obvious in the modern smart sense of the word.

We think that Mr. Bernard Shaw's address was rather more "brilliant and inspiring" than "the official attitude of the University" compressed into twenty-two lines would lead the reader to suppose. Else why were such extraordinary precautions taken to prevent an adequate and true report of his pearls of wisdom attaining wider publicity than the comparatively attenuated membership of the Heretics admits of?

Another correspondent, Mr. Johnson, says, speaking of the lecture: Mr. Shaw "was often blasphemous, but there was always a serious meaning not far below." Was Mr. Shaw "often blasphemous"? According to the official notice of his lecture he was not. It is obvious that a wagon and horses will never drag out of the select community of the Heretics what Mr. Shaw did say.

Two hundred words is enough, in their opinion, to devote to what their chosen notice describes as "vigorous outbursts of irreverence."

Perhaps Mr. Shaw will himself emerge from most uncharacteristic obscurity. According to the Christian Commonwealth, "Mr. Shaw embarked on an indictment of the current creeds of the Churches, an avowal of faith in democracy, an exposition of the Dionysian philosophy of the Superman, the Life-Force, and the Transvaluation of Religious Values." Two hundred words! Bernard Shaw is not the Bernard Shaw of yore if such pitiful treatment does not raise his gorge:—

> Fair Sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last;
> You spurned me such a day; and other time
> You called me—dog; and for these courtesies
> I'll lend you this much monies.

Shylock, temporarily at least, had his revenge. No better advertisement than two hundred words! Certainly Mr. Shaw should have his bond.

We abstain from repeating or adding to the phrases attributed to Mr. Shaw, and in the course of nine days not repudiated by him; but the atmosphere of the lecture-room is pleasantly pictured in the Christian Commonwealth, as follows:—

> It was pertinently objected by one Heretic that Mr. Shaw should endeavour to avoid the unpleasant word God, with its unsatisfactory associations. Mr. Shaw admitted the difficulty, but complained that he could do no better. For the views of one somewhat boresome critic Mr. Shaw requested twenty minutes' silent prayer.

The Christian Commonwealth proceeds:—"It was a magnificent meeting; Mr. Shaw appeared the very incarnation of G. B. S., gloriously irreverent, transparently sincere, divinely prophetic, and inspiring—the very thing for our older Universities." But only two hundred words for the public!

"The very thing for our older Universities," remarks the Christian Commonwealth. "Why drag in Socialism," shrieks the presidential Heretic.

Ay, there's the rub.

Last week we wrote:—

> Unless public attention is called to the vile and blasphemous ravings which are permitted to be poured into the ears of University students, what guarantee can there be that the individual soul and the body politic will not go down to perdition?

"The body politic"—the Heretics are not greatly disturbed at our condemnation of the revival of old schools of philosophy as the stock-in-trade of an itinerant lecturer to be foisted alike on willing and unwilling listeners, to undermine conviction, and to sap the centuries-old foundation of civilised communion. The gravamen lies in the fact that we hinted, not obscurely, at the ulterior aim underlying an active propaganda. That aim is in certain channels to use the Christian religion to support Socialism so far as its tenets appear to conduce to that end, and in other channels to overthrow its influence in order that the atmosphere of social hate and civic revolt in which Socialism-cum-Atheism flourishes in such rank luxuriance may be developed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Bernard Shaw, the Heretics, and the ten professors may without comment from us indulge in any esoteric system of philosophy which is agreeable to them. We excuse the annoyance which has been caused by publication; but, publication having occurred, we are entitled to comment on signs of the times which are of national and individual moment.

CECIL COWPER.

TOGO AND NOGI

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT

AMONGST the crowd of foreign representatives and visitors who are coming over to see or to take part in the Coronation there are two men who will stand out prominently above all others as true makers of history. They are Admiral Togo and General Nogi. Both have other titles: Nogi, for instance, is a Baron; and I believe Togo possesses an even higher patent of nobility. Not only in Japan, but throughout the world, they are so well known by their deeds, that William Pitt's remark when he was criticised for only making Nelson a Baron after the Battle of the Nile, "Admiral Nelson's fame would be co-equal with the British name; and it would be remembered that he had obtained the greatest naval victory on record, when no man would think of asking whether he had been created a Baron, a Viscount, or an Earl," equally applies to them.

It is now just six years since the Russo-Japanese War was brought to a close by the Treaty of Portsmouth, and already, except to those who took part in that mighty struggle between the East and the West, the battles and the names of the heroes who controlled the battle scenes are already forgotten, or else the mists of time have obscured the significance of the one and the prowess of the other. But to the people of Japan the names of Togo and Nogi are more than household words; they are enshrined in their hearts as deities rather than men, and they have taken their place in the imagination of the people amongst that galaxy of heroes who enlighten the pages of history and tradition, and who play such a decisive rôle in inspiring the lives and moulding the character of the Japanese people. Togo and Nogi are esteemed above all the brave and talented warriors who led Japan's army and navy during the war. And what a splendid line of soldiers she produced!

Who will forget Oyama, the Commander-in-Chief of all the Army, a grim old warrior, his face pitted with smallpox, a giant in size amongst his companions, who thirty years before the war had fought in chain armour, and armed with a battle-axe, in the revolutionary struggle in which the power of the nobles was finally crushed and the Mikado established the de jure and de facto head of the State? To what other general has science brought such unique changes? How could Oyama have foreseen that in less than thirty years his battleaxe would be cast aside and he himself would be the commander of a million warriors fully equipped with modern weapons and directed by modern science? Kodama, the famous chief of the Staff; Kuroki, the Commander of the First Army Corps; Oku, the Commander of the Second Army Corps, who would hurl his troops against almost impregnable positions and see whole divisions perish without turning a hair,—all these were brave and notable men. Nor must we forget Nodzu, the talented leader of the Fourth Corps, whose services to Japan were second to none.

All these men have left great reputations, and their names are respected throughout the length and breadth of Japan; but without being in any way wanting in respect, or without saying anything derogatory, none of them has acquired quite such a hold on the affections of the Japanese people as Togo and Nogi. There were many officers in the Japanese Navy probably as up-to-date, and having possibly a greater technical knowledge of their profession than Togo; there were certainly officers in the Japanese Army of equal determination and strategical skill as General Nogi. The former was constantly successful in all that he undertook; the latter met with a series of deplorable reverses for month after month which would have crushed the confidence and broken the heart of an ordinary man. Yet both the one in the hour of victory, and the other with the grim shadow of defeat and disaster hovering constantly over him, never lost the affection and confidence either of the Emperor or of his subjects.

Therefore it is to the moral qualities of these two remarkable men that we must turn for a proper understanding of why they occupy the unique position that they do in the hearts and in the imagination of the Japanese people. Both are typical representatives of the ancient Daimio spirit of Japan, and the Daimio spirit breeds the same heroes who thrive in the knightly annals of mediæval romance and chivalry. Simplicity, modesty, bravery, a profound sense of duty, and a love of their country are the keynotes of the characters of both Togo and Nogi. Whether on land at an Imperial garden-party, or on the bridge of the Mikasa during the height of an engagement, Togo was always the same good-natured, modest, courtly gentleman, full of humour and playfulness, and apparently as free from care or anxiety as a child in the nursery. I visited him on his flag-ship at the Japanese naval base at the Elliott Islands in June, 1904. We were forty miles from Port Arthur, and at any moment one of his cruisers might signal that the Russian Squadron was on its way out to give battle to his fleet. Already the rumours that Russia was fitting out a second fleet in the Baltic, which she would despatch as early as possible to unite with the squadron in Port Arthur, had assumed a practical form. Two of the Japanese battleships—the Hatsuse and Yashima—had recently been lost on mines, thus considerably reducing the fighting strength of the Japanese fleet. Admiral Togo had to face the problem of destroying the fleet in Port Arthur before the arrival of Rojesvenski's fleet, otherwise the combined Russian squadron would have been in overwhelming strength. At the same time he had to hold the Vladivostock squadron in check and prevent any interruption of the transport service between Japan and Korea.

This was the most critical moment of the war, and the future of his country rested on Togo's shoulders. Yet nothing could disturb the serenity of his character and the even balance of his temperament. No disaster to his ships or failure of his plans could draw from him a sign or a gesture of annoyance, surprise, or disappointment at the caprices of an unkindly fate. In the midst of his harassing duties and pressing anxieties he received us, who had come to visit him, as a charming host in the most hospitable manner, showed us round his ship, explained the actions she had already taken part in, and then invited us to his cabin to drink champagne. Togo never courted publicity. When, after the battle of Round Island on August 10th, 1904, which settled the fate of the Port Arthur squadron, he returned to Japan to consult with the authorities at Tokio on the future conduct of the war, he could hardly be induced to show himself in public. The municipality of Tokio wished to do him special honour at a grand civic reception. But he modestly declined, declaring that his work was not yet done, and that it would be time enough to think of honours and entertainments when the war was at an end.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

That which I have written of Admiral Togo applies in an equal degree to General Nogi. I was with him constantly from the day the army arrived before Port Arthur at the beginning of August, 1904, to the historic January 1st, 1905, when Stoessel finally surrendered. During this period I saw Nogi and spoke with him every week under various circumstances. The first occasion was just prior to the first assault on the Eastern Section of the Forts in August. At that time his army was flushed with victory; it had gained a series of successes on the Liatung Peninsular, and expected to take Port Arthur at the first assault, and then to hasten north to complete the destruction of Kuropatkin's army. Nogi was calm, polite, and full of consideration for us foreigners, and endeavoured even amidst his pressing responsibilities to make us feel welcome and to provide for our comfort. We asked him if he anticipated a speedy triumph. The General smiled, and replied that only a higher power could foretell that. I did not see him again to speak to until a week later, after the complete failure of the assault and the loss of 18,000 of his best troops. His face displayed no sign of the emotions which must have inwardly stirred him when the extent of the disaster became known and minute by minute the telephone brought in news of the loss of his best officers and bravest men. He was just as considerate for our welfare, and inquired how we had fared during the fight and if our present quarters were comfortable.

The siege dragged on, outlying works were captured, and at length the day arrived for the second general assault, which was fixed for October 30th, the Mikado's birthday.

saw Nogi at his headquarters the day before, and he told me of his plans. His manner was the same, but three months' constant strain and anxiety had caused a few grey hairs to appear. Again the assault ended in complete failure, and the General, taking the full responsibility on his own shoulders, is said to have written to the Emperor requesting permission to commit suicide on account of his repeated failures to take the fortress. But the Emperor and his advisers, with a full appreciation of the difficulties with which he was faced, expressed their full satisfaction, and ordered him to retain the command. Another month passed, and during this period Nogi was to be found constantly in his advance lines superintending the placing of batteries and encouraging his troops to fresh exertions. Then came the fateful 26th November, 1904, a day which will ever live in the military annals of Japan. Again the Eastern section of the forts was assaulted. From 1 p.m. until night cast her friendly pall over the dreadful carnage Nogi saw wave after wave of his choicest infantry break over the Russian forts and fall away like the scattering serf at the heights of a mighty storm. The Japanese had anticipated success, but they were beaten on all sides, and nearly twenty thousand killed or wounded strewed the pathway of their premature and futile gallantry.

This was a reverse calculated to break the strongest will, and it must have been a night of bitter reflection for the Japanese General. But he showed no sign of wavering or of despair. On the following morning, November 27th, he turned his horse's head towards the West, and ordered that series of assaults on 203-Metre Hill which has made the name a byword in war. From November 27th to December 5th assault succeeded bombardment and bombardment assault until the devoted Russian garrison were literally pounded into submission, and the Japanese stood victorious on that hill on which lay 14,000 dead and wounded men. Among the slain was Nogi's son, his other having fallen at Nanshan. After the siege, when General Stoessel sympathised with him on his loss, Nogi replied: "One of my sons fell at Nanshan, the other on 203-Metre Hill: both these positions were important for my army to take, and I would not have it otherwise."

During December the siege dragged on, and one by one the Russian forts fell, and then at length, on January 1st, Stoessel surrendered. On the following day I visited headquarters to offer my congratulations. Surely, if ever, on this occasion, the generalissimo of the army was entitled to feel some little pride and elation at his triumph, but I found absolutely no change in Nogi. He was just the same modest, courteous gentleman, taking no credit to himself, but attributing it all to the wisdom of the Emperor and to the goodness of his ancestral deities. From all parts of the world congratulations were pouring in on him. The Mikado had favoured the army with a special message, and the impetuous Kaiser had telegraphed bestowing on him the order of the Black Eagle. Nogi seemed surprised at these manifestations, and incapable of understanding their significance. He felt himself an unworthy recipient of so many honours, and would only accept them for the army's sake. His one idea was to hasten to the North and assist his comrades at the battle of Mukden, in which he played a decisive part. Since the war Nogi has presided at the head of Japan's military college, where he has continued to mould the character of his country's future leaders just as did General Lee at the close of the American Civil War.

Such men as Togo and Nogi are rare in these days. They are not bred in the commercial and material environment of the twentieth century. They belong rather to that epoch of knightly chivalry which filled the ranks of the Crusaders, and which later produced Bayard. They are the children of centuries of isolation, tradition, particular environment, and, above all, of that simplicity which does not arise from ignorance, but which is the result of a profound belief in spiritual guidance as embodied in the person of the Mikado. They were educated in the school of the warlike Samuri and courtly Daimois. Neither had any other thought than to serve his country, and, if necessary, to die for her. Neither possessed the least trace of personal ambition. Both were incapable of taking any credit to themselves for their deeds, and cared nought for honours or rewards. It was their privilege and pleasure to serve their country. The only reward they coveted was to see Japan victorious, and once this had been accomplished both were content to retire to the solitude of those beautiful gardens which they love so well. In adversity both were serene, confident in the justice of their cause, and in the wisdom of the supreme power which guided their actions, and were therefore certain of eventual success; in victory both were magnanimous, humane, and modest. Togo and Nogi can say of themselves, which but few have a right to say:—

I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

THE STORY OF A BOOK

I.—THE WRITER

THE history of a book must necessarily begin with the history of its author, for surely in these enlightened days neither the youngest nor the oldest of critics can believe that works of art are found under gooseberry-bushes or in the nests of storks. In truth, I am by no means sure that everybody knew this before the publication of "The Man

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Shakespeare," and for the sake of a mystified posterity it may be well to explain that there was once a school of criticism that thought it indecent to pry into that treasure-house of individuality from which, if we reject the nursery hypotheses mentioned above, it is clearly obvious that authors devise their works. That the drama must needs be closely related to the dramatist is just one of those simple discoveries that invariably elude the subtle professional mind; but in this wiser hour I may be permitted to assume that the author was the conscious father of his novel, and that he did not find it surprisingly in his pocket one morning, like a bad shilling taken in change from the cabman overnight.

Before he published his novel at the ripe age of thirty-seven the author had lived an irreproachable and gentlemanly life. Born with at least a German silver spoon in his mouth, he passed after a normally eventful childhood through a respectable Public School, and spent several agreeable years at Cambridge without taking a degree. He then went into his uncle's office in the City, where he idled daily from ten to four, till in due course he was admitted to a partnership, which enabled him to reduce his hours of idleness to eleven to three. These details become important when we reflect that from his childhood on the author had a great deal of time at his disposal. If he had been entirely normal, he would have accepted the conventions of the society to which he belonged, and devoted himself to motoring, bridge, and the encouragement of the lighter drama. But some deep-rooted habit of his childhood, or even perhaps some remote hereditary taint, led him to spend an appreciable fraction of his leisure time in the reading of works of fiction. Unlike most lovers of light literature he read with a certain mental concentration, and was broad-minded enough to read good novels as well as bad ones.

It is a pleasant fact that it is impossible to concentrate one's mind on anything without in time becoming wiser, and in the course of years the author became quite a skilful critic of novels. From the first he had allowed his reading to colour his impressions of life, and had obediently lived in a world of blacks and whites, of heroes and heroines, of villains and adventuresses, until the grateful discovery of the realistic school of fiction permitted him to believe that men and women were for the most part neither good nor bad, but tabby. Moreover, the leisurely reading of many sentences had given him some understanding of the elements of style. He perceived that some combinations of words were illogical, and that others were unlovely to the ear; and at the same time he acquired a vocabulary and a knowledge of grammar and punctuation that his earlier education had failed to give him. He read new novels at his writing-table, and took pleasure in correcting the mistakes of their authors in ink. When he had done this, he would hand them to his wife, who always read the end first, and, indeed, rarely pursued her investigation of a book beyond the last chapter.

We buy knowledge with illusions, and pay a high price for it, for the acquirement of quite a small degree of wisdom will deprive us of a large number of pleasant fancies. So it was with the author, who found his joy in novel-reading diminishing rapidly as his critical knowledge increased. He was no longer able to lose himself between the covers of a romance, but slid his paper-knife between the pages of a book with an unwholesome readiness to be initiated by the ignorance and folly of the novelist. His destructive criticism of works of fiction became so acute, that it was natural that his unlettered friends should suggest that he himself ought to write a novel. For a long while he was content to receive the flattering suggestion with a reticent smile that masked his conviction that there was a difference between criticism and creation. But as he grew older the imperfections in the books he read ceased to give him the thrill of the successful explorer in sight of the expected, and time began to trickle too slowly through his idle fingers. One day he sat down and wrote "Chapter I." at the head of a sheet of quarto paper.

It seemed to him that the difficulty was only one of selection, and he wrote two-thirds of a novel with a breathless ease of creation that made him marvel at himself and the pitiful struggles of less gifted novelists. Then in a moment of insight he picked up his manuscript and realised that what he had written was childishly crude. He had felt his story while he wrote it, but somehow or other he had failed to get his emotions on paper, and he saw quite clearly that it was worse and not better than the majority of the books which he had held up to ridicule.

There was a certain doggedness in his character that might have made him a useful citizen but for that unfortunate hereditary spoon, and he wrote "Chapter I." at the head of a new sheet of quarto paper long before the library fire had reached the heart of his first luckless manuscript. This time he wrote more slowly, and with a waning confidence that failed him altogether when he was about half-way through. Reading the fragment dispassionately he thought there were good pages in it, but, taken as a whole, it was unequal, and moved forward only by fits and starts. He began again with his late manuscript spread about him on the table for reference. At the fifth attempt he succeeded in writing a whole novel.

In the course of his struggles he had acquired a philosophy of composition. Especially he had learned to shun those enchanted hours when the labour of creation became suspiciously easy, for he had found by experience that the work he did in these moments of inspiration was either bad in itself or out of key with the preceding chapters. He thought that inspiration might be useful to poets or writers of short stories, but personally as a novelist he found it a nuisance. By dint of hard work, however, he succeeded in eliminating its evil influence from his final draft. He told himself that he had no illusions as to the merits of his book. He knew he was not a man of genius, but he knew also that the grammar and the punctuation of his novel were far above the average for such works, and although he could not read Sir Thomas Browne or Walter Pate with pleasure, he felt sure that his book was written in a straightforward and gentlemanly style. He was prepared to be told that his use of the colon was audacious, and looked forward with pleasure to an agreeable controversy on the question.

He read his book to his friends, who made suggestions that would have involved its re-writing from one end to the other. He read it to his enemies, who told him that it was nearly good enough to publish; he read it to his wife, who said that it was very nice, and that it was time to dress for dinner. No one seemed to realise that it was the most important thing he had ever done in his life. This quickened his eagerness to get it published, an eagerness only tempered by a very real fear of those knowing dogs, the critics. He could not forget that he had criticised a good many books himself in terms that would have made the authors abandon their profession if they had but heard his strictures; and he had read notices in the papers that would have made him droop with shame if they had referred to any work of his. When these sombre thoughts came to him he would pick up his book and read it again, and in common fairness he had to admit to himself that he found it uncommonly good.

One day, after a whole batch of ungrammatical novels had reached him from the library, he posted his manuscript to his favourite publisher. He had heard stories of masterpieces many times rejected, so he did not tell his wife what he had done.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE MIDDLE AGES

The Mediæval Mind. By HENRY OSBORN TAYLOR. (Macmillan and Co. Two Vols. 21s. net.)

ONE thing at all events may be said of this carefully studied, sincere, and scholarly book; as Miss Evelyn Underhill's "Mysticism" will always be essential to the student of mystic thought, so this conspectus of mediæval forms of emotion and intellect will be an unfailing help to those who seek to navigate the vast and wonderful seas of the Middle Ages. Above all, it is a well-founded and careful book; Mr. Taylor traces the steps on which the great monument of the Middle Ages was built with unfailing patience. He shows us Greek philosophy, Latin law, Oriental Christianity all mingling into one stream. He traces the mixture of peoples, the influences of Teuton and Italian, Celt and Norseman resolving themselves into one great synthesis. He takes account of the mystic passion of St. Francis on one hand and of the military feudalism on the other; he surveys the whole field of the mediæval Ethos. Again, "The Mediæval Mind" resembles Miss Underhill's survey of mysticism in this, that it is a book to be indicated, not reviewed, unless the services of a whole battalion of specialists are to be requisitioned.

So much being allowed in all fairness, it may be doubted whether the author would not have done well to have called in an assessor, who would have supplemented this ingenious and laborious marshalling of facts and dates and biographies and quotations with that grain of insight which would have made all live. So far as one can see, the facts are all right. What is wanted is the explanation of the facts, the unveiling of the secret fountains from which all the amazing and beautiful streams of mediæval thought and fantasy and romance and devotion proceeded. "I wonder if there is anything back of all this," an American once said to me, speaking of some subject or another; and so, after reading Mr. Taylor's book, one is inclined to ask much the same question—Was there any motive power behind this set of facts and that set of facts; and if so, what was it?

To give an instance—or instances. The author writes a blameless and accurate outline history of the Celtic Church, he is instructive on the romances of chivalry, useful in the matter of the Graal legends. But, to be quite frank, he does not seem to understand, in any deep internal sense, any one of these subjects; and he does not perceive how all three are linked together, how in the immortal travesty of "Don Quixote" we hear from far off the lonely, thrilling accents of the Celtic monk:—

> As they were thus proceeding, then, they discovered a small boat, without oars or any other gear, that lay at the water's edge tied to the stem of a tree growing on the bank. Don Quixote looked all round and bade Sancho get down from Dapple and tie both beasts securely to the trunk of a poplar or willow that stood there. Sancho asked him the reason of this sudden dismounting and tying. Don Quixote made answer, "Thou must know, Sancho, that this bark here is plainly, and without the possibility of any alternative, calling and inviting me to enter it . . . for this is the way of the books of chivalry and of the enchanters who figure and speak in them.

True enough, this was the way of the books of chivalry; but many centuries before the books of chivalry were heard of it was the actual practice of Irish and Welsh and Scottish monks. Even the detail has survived in the parody; the boat was without oars or any other gear; and it was even in a boat without oars or sails that the Saint of Briton set on his strange way across the deeps. What did he seek? Who knows? perhaps the saints themselves could hardly have told us. In their hearts, perhaps, there was the mingling of many desires: the mere animal longing for change of place, the human longing for adventure, for the glimpse of the land, whatever it may be, that lies beyond the farthest wave; the motive of the missionary; the Celtic dream of paradise under the name of Avalon lying somewhere in the sunset, across the glassy waterfloods: all these may have entered into the heart of the saint as he pushed out his oarless, sailless boat into the foaming deep. At any rate such was the common practice of the Celtic monk—even in the days of our King Alfred such strange voyagers were washed on the shores of Cornwall—and there can be no doubt that this routine of the Celtic monastery is the origin of the "errancy" of the knights in the romances, of their readiness to embark on such an adventure as that which is burlesqued in "Don Quixote."

Here, then, we get the two chief sources of the typical knight of the story-books. He is a fighting man, as in the "Gestes;" but to the Norse hardihood has been united the spiritual, magical questing instinct of the Celtic monk: the mighty feats of Lancelot are Norman, his love-making is French, but his ardours for the Graal betray the mystic robes of the old dim Welsh saint, still discernible beneath the courtly surcoat and the warrior's chain mail.

Again, still following the same line of thought, one cannot but feel that Mr. Taylor's treatment of the Graal Legend is somewhat dry and banal. He lays stress on what is called the "human" side of the legend—as if the passion for God were less human than the passion for a woman!—and thereby, as it seems to me, quite misses the point—the differentia—of the Graal romances. Not for a moment do I wish to disparage tales of mortal love; far otherwise. But the essential quality of the Graal romances is, after all, their possession and treatment of the Graal motive. Lancelot and Guinevere make a brave story; but there are parallels to it in the great book of romance: the splendours and ardours and wonders of the Graal are unique: Galahad is a lonely figure. And this essential quality of the Graal story—its mystic spiritual ardour—is without doubt a part of the contribution of the Celts to the literature of the Middle Ages. And the signs accompanying the manifestations of the Holy Vessel, the shining of a great light and the odours as of paradise, are all to be paralleled in the lives of the Celtic saints.

There is an odd admission in the author's very interesting treatment of the Scholastic Philosophy. Speaking of the famous Duns Scotus, he says:—"If you enter his lists you are lost. The right way to attack him is to stand without and laugh." And Mr. Taylor adds that this was done afterwards, when whoever cared for such reasonings was called a Dunce.

The admission, I say, is an odd one, since it really amounts to a denial of the reasoning faculty. "Logically," says Mr. Taylor, "the argumentation is inerrant." There is nothing false, that is, in the premises; there is no objection to be brought against the way in which the conclusions are drawn from these premises: technically and in all other respects the reasoning of Duns is inexpugnable—he is not to be confuted. And the only thing is to laugh; if you argue, if you use that noblest faculty of man—as it used to be called—the reason, you are lost, you will find yourself hopelessly in the wrong. Duns proves to you that two and two makes four; you cannot deny it, so you raise a loud guffaw and retain your private and sacred opinion that the sum of these two numbers is really five. And there are still people who contrast the stern reasoning of modern times with the simple credulity of the ages of faith—or superstition. To laugh at an opponent, taking all the while the greatest care not to cross logical swords with him, may be a capital plan, but it seems an odd way of showing your superior reasoning power.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are two wonderful passages cited from the angelic doctor, St. Thomas Aquinas. One affirms that "man's final beatitude, which is his perfection, cannot consist in the cognition of sense-objects." The other describes all law, all civil government, all morality, all the arts of hygiene, sanitation, and medicine, all the rules of living as existing for one end, and for one end alone: that is the contemplation of God. Here you have one of the most exalted conceptions of human life that the mind of man has ever framed; and, comparing the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas with the doctrine of to-day, one is enabled to measure the terrific height from which we have fallen in the course of seven centuries.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

LIGHTS OF YESTERDAY

Ancient Lights and Certain New Reflections. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. With numerous Illustrations. (Chapman and Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. FORD MADOX HUEFFER gives us to wonder what he might have been. Being what he is in spite of his early environment, we are moved to imagine the Ford Madox Hueffer of other juvenile surroundings. He prefaces his book by a dedication to "My dear Kids," and, in years to come, Christina and Katharine, in comparing the dedication with the book itself, will also jump for joy when thinking of the great escape of their father. He has missed "the spiritual gift of heredity."

The dedication has been written in a vein of pessimism. Mr. Hueffer sees much of his early life through the business end of a telescope; some of these memories of a young man are greatly magnified. The author was trained in the awe of the Great Victorians, in the heavy atmosphere which surrounded his grandfather, Madox Brown. Instead of taking upon himself the stolidity of his surroundings, instead of bathing in the reflections of their greatness, young Hueffer built up for himself a philosophy of contrast. The spirit of the child who would be a bridge-builder because father is a bridge-builder is not here; rather the feeling of the broken-hearted child who unwillingly is receiving pianoforte lessons. The shade of the music-master—with a thin cane held behind his back—is here. Perchance his father's remark that "Fordie" was a "patient but extremely stupid donkey" left its mark on the youth. However, all this is now of the past, though not a very distant past, for, he says, "I made for myself the somewhat singular discovery that I can only be said to have grown up a very short time ago—perhaps three months, perhaps six." As a child Mr. Hueffer was severely disciplined, and when free from this discipline moved among those Victorian giants who appeared to the youngster to be "morally and physically twenty-five feet high." We wonder whether Mr. Hueffer's children feel him to be Lilliputian: we hope not. "Life was simply not worth living" because of the existence of Carlyle, of Ruskin, of Holman Hunt, of Browning, or of "the gentlemen who built the Crystal Palace." But Mr. Hueffer must be of good cheer: he must live for the future and for "his dear kids," and then, as Wordsworth said—

> An old age, serene and bright,
> And lovely as a Lapland night,
> Shall lead thee to thy grave.

The sadness of unattained ideals and never-ending homilies must exist only as memories of that long adolescence.

In a light and humorously serious postscript Mr. Hueffer explains that the book is one of impressions and that he has throughout attempted to recreate the atmosphere of the Pre-Raphaelite movement. "This book, in short, is full of inaccuracies as to facts, but its accuracy as to impressions is absolute. . . . I have for facts a most profound contempt." This last remark is a sweeping assertion, which we are thankful is not borne out in the book itself. The licence of the artist who paints carrots in royal blue and hay-stacks in heliotrope cannot be allowed in a volume of memoirs. The picture of the human side of the individuals at the centre of the Æsthetic Movement, which succeeded the Pre-Raphaelite Movement, is one of great interest, and those of us who came into contact with the camp-followers of the movement will cherish this touch of humanity. The names of great men often are besmirched because of the inanities of their satellites—those superficial nobodies who invent a cult or found a club to enclose a tinsel shrine whereon a true worshipper would commit a hasty suicide. Enough of these imitators, who only imitate the clothes of their departed saints!—a matrimonial agency for the cultivation of small talk best describes their efforts. Their very existence is a travesty, which brings scorn upon their heroes. In the next generation we may expect a Shavian cult, one of the features of which will be the wearing of a Shavian beard. But at the heart of the movement there was "no inclination to live on the smell of the lily."

Wilde first formulated this "poetically vegetarian theory of life," which is Mr. Hueffer's apt description of the ambition for "poetic pallor and ascetic countenances." Very human are Madox Brown's anecdotes of William Morris. So, too, must be described the vision of Rossetti stretched on a sofa with lighted candles at feet and at head, while having grapes dropped into his mouth by two extremely beautiful ladies. This was not the vision for the vision's sake, but simply the love of beautiful ladies and of grapes. The leaders of the movement quarrelled like schoolboys: we see Ruskin, who had the toothache, reading to a friend the first hundred and twenty pages of "Stones of Venice." There is something very exhilarating about Madox Brown's thinly-veiled anxiety over an escape of gas when Burne-Jones had persuaded the President of the Royal Academy to accompany him to a private view in the twilight. How Mr. Hueffer's grandfather hated the Royal Academicians!

All these light touches must have relieved the monotony of Mr. Hueffer's early days. There is almost a suggestion that some of these memories must be largely of the impressionist type. We will quote two of the many interesting sidelights upon those of the inner circle:

> Charles Dickens called loudly for the immediate imprisonment of Millais and the other pre-Raphaelites, including my grandfather, who was not a pre-Raphaelite. Blasphemy was the charge alleged against them, just as it was the charge alleged against the earliest upholders of Wagner's music in England. This may seem incredible, but I have in my possession three letters from three different members of the public addressed to my father, who was the musical critic of the Times. The writers stated that unless Doctor Hueffer abstained from upholding the blasphemous music of the future—and in each case the writer used the word blasphemous—he would be respectively stabbed, ducked in a horse-pond, and beaten to death by hired roughs.

Those must have been stirring times for musical critics. Or, again, consider the fatherly thought of the author's grandfather as exemplified in the following:—

> I remember an anecdote which Madox Brown's housemaid was in the habit of relating to me when she used to put me to bed. Said she—and the exact words remain upon my mind:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"I was down in the kitchen waiting to carry up the meat, when a cabman comes down the area steps and says: 'I've got your master in my cab. He's very drunk.' I says to him—and an immense intonation of pride would come into Charlotte's voice—'My master's a-sitting at the head of his table entertaining his guests. That's Mr. ——. Carry him upstairs and lay him in the bath.'"

Madox Brown, whose laudable desire it was at many stages of his career to redeem poets and others from dipsomania, was in the habit of providing several of them with labels, upon which were inscribed his own name and address. . . . The poet having been put into the bath would be reduced to sobriety by cups of the strongest coffee that could be made. (The bath was selected because he would not be able to roll out and to injure himself.) And having thus been reduced to sobriety, he would be lectured, and he would be kept in the house, being given nothing stronger than lemonade to drink, until he found the régime intolerable. Then he would disappear, the label sewn inside his coat collar, to reappear once more in the charge of a cabman.

Yet, in spite of such stories, the youthful Hueffer's life was one of monotony. Would a Sydney-street fusillade have moved him?

Belonging to the outer ring of friendship were most of the men of prominence of that time; some, like Whistler and Meredith, quickly carved out distinct paths for themselves, but, of those famed in the arts, few escaped influence. Meredith's poems attracted the pre-Raphaelite painters and writers, and Meredith became a fourth in Rossetti's household, but, as is well known, he did not appreciate the life, and quickly ended the compact. Later Mr. Shaw came into Mr. Hueffer's life, and we are treated to an amusing, yet sad, picture of G. B. S.'s early life in London. Mr. Shaw possessed no presentable garments except his suit of dress-clothes, and received an invitation to a soirée given by some high political personage, who added a postscript begging Mr. Shaw not to dress. What was Shaw to do? He pawned his dress clothes, and was able to appear at the function in a suit "resembling that of a Wesleyan minister." The first person he encountered was Mr. Balfour in evening dress; and to his surprise, but, we suspect, also to his delight, he quickly perceived that he was the only undressed person present! The philanthropic and thoughtful host had not realised that the only material asset of the rising genius was his evening dress. Mr. Hueffer would not go back to those early days. He prefers the civilisation, the politeness, the kindliness, and the polish of to-day. Still there is bitterness; art is so materialistic, finance is king, the newspaper is sacrificed to its advertisers: "life is good nowadays, but art is very bitter."

Mr. Hueffer's book must be read to be fully appreciated: its light and airy style will serve as a perpetual tonic to the reader. The glorious contrast from the majority of the autobiographical compilations of the present day adds to its charm. We envy the "dear kids."

AN AMERICAN ON INDIA

The West in the East. From an American Point of View. By PRICE COLLIER. (Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

A SECOND book from the author of "England and the English" was not to be anticipated without some mental stirrings. Now that it is an accomplished fact its matter has fully justified the most pleasurable of these. Its title covers the broadest geographical range of political and social problems. The volume, in fact, comprises a study of the British rule in India and of the European life in China and Japan. This description of its contents is neither subtle nor adequate; but it will have to serve until further insight can be obtained into the subject of this remarkable work.

There are some who on first opening the pages may feel inclined to regard the book with some doubt. At the outset Mr. Collier confesses frankly that the scenes and impressions he has rendered are the result of no more than a year's travel in the East. Now, it is an axiom in the Anglo-Indian community that a lifetime spent in India leads only to the dim threshold of the knowledge of its life. There are some who go further, and who deny that a full comprehension of the workings of the Eastern mind is ever possible to the Westerner. In which case a year of conscientious travel through the land of Sikh, Pathan, and Babu should supply as efficient a result in its way as a prolonged residence. So far as Mr. Collier is concerned, one may safely take it that the period of his stay was as productive as would have been a decade on the part of less intelligent and observant travellers. The author's journeyings, moreover, were through a country with whose problems he had already become familiar by prolonged studies. His work, therefore, demands to be taken very seriously. It may have its detractors; but even to these it cannot fail to give ample matter for thought.

The most salient feature in the work is one that must cause even the most lethargic of Englishmen to prick his ears—a dispassionate appreciation of British rule in India. To this end Mr. Collier was afforded opportunities that fall to the lot of few. He experienced the hospitality of the high officials, from the Viceroy downwards; he accompanied Civil servants on their official peregrinations and lived the tent life in their company; he was the guest of native Rajahs; he pottered amongst the bazaars, saw the seamy side of Eastern existence, and spoke with many who were avowedly hostile to the British dominion. With all this to his hand something rather out of the ordinary was to be expected from one who has already exhibited a profound and remorseless power of analysis. We are not disappointed.

Mr. Collier's verdict is strongly and overwhelmingly in favour of the British rule. Such praise as he gives is all the more valuable from the fact that not even the most complacent could regard it as unqualified. The author's appreciation of merit is shrewd, but his scent for weaknesses is equally keen. His admiration for those quiet men who, unadvertised und unproclaimed, help to govern India with infinite integrity, courage, and patience is unbounded, and is expressed with an unreserved generosity. His condemnation of the red-tape methods, of the crassly indulgent and wavering policy engendered from London, an anxiety to please at all costs that the Hindus mistake for fear and despise accordingly, is equally direct and equally justified. No undiluted diet of sugar-plums occupies Mr. Collier's pages. Here, for instance, are some of his comments on one of the men, Clive, whose names stand at the foundation of the Empire:—

> He changed the East India Company from a band of plundering pedlars into the beginnings of a beneficent Government. He won for England the greatest dependency she has ever had, or ever will have. He realised to the Indian a white Governor as powerful and more just than any ruler in their history. The shadow of his greatness still lends security to every white man, woman, and child, and likewise to every brown man, woman, and child in India.
>
> He forged a friend's name, he lied to an accomplice, he accepted wealth from those he conquered, he died by his own hand.

No, Mr. Collier has no intention of sparing us when his lancet has found a spot into which to probe. Here again are a few words on the Mutiny of history and on the continent of to-day :—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Women and children outraged, suffocated, pitchforked on bayonets, burnt, stabbed, starved. and strangled: it is a horrible tale. Say what one will of all that, it is British business, British vengeance, not ours, but it is a disgrace to the whole white race that British callousness, and lack of taste and reverence, should permit these graves to be overgrown with weeds, should suffer that miserable little graveyard on the ridge above Delhi, should allow the lettering on the Kashmir gate to become defaced.

The censure is scathing. Yet it need not put the reader out of sympathy with the author. There is no jeer in the earnestly bitter note that comes from an understanding of what has been suffered and achieved, of the work that is being carried on now, and of the hampering and harassing of the workers that frequently suffices for their sole reward. There are some who may bring it against Mr. Collier that his tendencies are more imperialistic than those of a certain proportion of Englishmen. If by Imperialism is meant a broad and practical grasp of the duties and responsibilities of the white race in India, then this is indeed the case. The author has pointed out in pungent fashion the truths that strike with such compelling force in the East, and that are so lamentably ignored elsewhere. Bringing to bear his exceptional power of analysis, he scoffs at that ridiculous myth of Indian self-government which has duped so many in the West who are ignorant of even the first principles of caste, and to whom Sikh and Bengali, Mahratta and Gurka, Mohamedan and Buddhist are all one.

In Bombay Mr. Collier conversed with a native journalist of violent anti-British convictions. Speaking of Mr. Keir Hardie, the man was frankness itself. "We do not follow him," he replied, "we are only using him as we should use anybody else who will follow us! The men he influences," he continued, "are of little use to us, but they are a nuisance to the British." Now this testimony must be of a certain interest in that it reveals the true attitude of the Hindu towards the efforts of a white agitator who has taken the race beneath an ill-balanced wing. But the words carry a more weighty significance than this. In the House of Parliament the purveying of nuisances for the British is a fair and innocuous game, legitimate strategy, well understood by all parties. In the hothouse atmosphere of India this identical procedure is fraught with a peril that must cause even the European agitator himself to shudder did he but understand, the drenching of Indian soil with the blood of white men, women, and children to the accompaniment of the usual unspeakable horrors. To some this may sound an impossible nightmare; yet a propaganda to this very end is even now being carried on by many a smooth-tongued Bengali. Should such an attempt ever be made, where could the blood of the murdered lie but on the heads of the agitators whose crass ignorance had led them to judge of Eastern philosophy by that of West? For in justice to those born on British soil the crime must be stamped as an unwitting one. I, for one, will never believe that those who trampled in where even a Western angel would have stammered among strange gods were actuated by any motive more sinister than that of consummate self-conceit. Were it otherwise, the shame would lie on the land that bred them.

To a thinker and observer such as Mr. Collier the intricacies of the Indian situation were not long in revealing them. It is necessary once again to quote his words at length :

> It is somewhat disconcerting to an observer and student of Indian affairs, therefore, to find that it is from the Hindu element and largely from the Brahman caste that the murderers, bomb-throwers, seditious editors of the vernacular press, and the men who shoot down the English officials on platforms and in theatres are drawn. . . . The Brahman is the leader of the reactionist party. He prefers, apparently, that the mass of the people should remain ignorant, debased, diseased, and helpless, as his position is magnified by just the width of the social chasm between himself and them. . . . This attempt of the Brahman agitators to oust the British . . . is an effort to replace British control by the rule of the Brahman, which represents the most tyrannical, the most un-American, and the most revolting social, religious, and political autocracy the world has ever seen. How any American, whatever his ideals or his sympathies, can lend his influence in support of a movement to increase the power of the Brahman caste in India, politically or otherwise, can only be explained on two grounds: he is either maliciously mischievous, or he is ignorant.

The "West in the East" is a dangerous book from which to quote. Had I my own way, I would take a truth such as this from every page, and thus end by rivalling the bulk of the book itself. It is one the importance of which cannot be over-estimated. The work will doubtless circulate freely in the clubs, and more especially in such neighbourhoods as constitute the special haunts of the Anglo-Indian. But it is not in such places alone that I would see it. I would have it in every spot where the working men congregate, and where the advanced doctrines of the day are uttered in frank good faith. To many a portion of its epigram and of its delightful descriptive passages may be lost. That, again, matters not in the least, for there is not a reader who will not obtain an accurate picture of India from its pages, and who will not find himself—probably for the first time—face to face with the real problems of that great conglomeration of countries. He will understand why the rights of mankind, as understood in the East and in the West, are respectively as oil and water, and the unalterable reasons why the distinctions between the two must remain. He will realise something of caste, of racial feuds, and of the circumstances that win the respect of the Oriental, and he will open his eyes more widely than ever before.

As to those many thousands, of which the reviewer may count himself one, who themselves have some practical acquaintance with India, and whose kith and kin are helping to guard the Empire in the East, they have every reason to be grateful to Mr. Collier, who, frankly disinterested and coolly critical, has supplied a testimony that it behoves every Englishman to read. We may swallow his praise, and stand up to his hits with a wry smile. The accurately-weighed mixture cannot fail to be of service to the nation at large.

W. H. Koebel.

THE FAMILY OF SIR FRANCIS DRAKE

The Family and Heirs of Sir Francis Drake. By Lady Eliott-Drake. Two Volumes. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 31s. 6d. net.)

"What's in a name?" A very great deal if we may judge from the present bulky volumes before us. It seems that the pre-eminence of Drake has been the excuse for presenting us with an acconnt of the illustrious seaman's family and heirs. There is a pretty legend to the effect that when England is in danger a few taps upon Drake's drum will bring its owner to our aid. We feel like striking that drum and asking Drake if he could reasonably countenance the publication of a work that is far more suitable for private circulation than to be issued in the ordinary way. Had the great Drake himself left issue there might have been a vast difference in the interest of the material available; but he died childless, and, to be perfectly frank, we have to deal with a number of people who were in no way remarkable. Many of them seem to have had a mania for litigation, and though not a few were good and useful citizens, staunch Protestants and Whigs, none of them stand out as being particularly noteworthy. Only in the last generation do we find two vice-admirals carrying on something of the old tradition of the sea.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Lady Eliott-Drake has written but little concerning the great Sir Francis on the ground that others have done so, fully and excellently, elsewhere. Although a detailed account would have been beyond the scope of the present work, we could have wished that the author had set aside her modesty and given us a brief but intimate sketch of her famous collateral ancestor. As it is, we have a few cold facts strung together, always with such a due regard to treading on the toes, or domains, of other writers on the subject, with the lamentable result that we get a Drake almost entirely shorn of his unique spirit of adventure on the one hand, and of his loyal love of Queen and country on the other. Why, we may ask, has much space been given to Drake's scheme for bringing fresh water to Plymouth and to the present-day "Fyshynge Feaste" held in commemoration of that event, while the victory over the Spanish Armada is passed by almost without a reference?

Certain details, however, are of special interest. Lady Eliott-Drake writes:—"Until cocoa-nuts were brought to Europe in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, none had been seen in England—at least not as fruits. It is true that, carried along by the Gulf Stream and washed ashore as flotsam and jetsam, such things had been picked up singly and at rare intervals, but no one regarded them as having anything to do with the vegetable world; they were much more mysterious objects—nothing less than griffin's or dragon's eggs!" It was Drake who gave Elizabeth one of these cocoa-nuts, and she had the happy idea of returning it to him "set in gold, and mounted in a way which had reference to this credence, to her own Royal Arms, of which one of the supporters was a Tudor griffin, and to Drake's arms and name, 'El Draque' (the Dragon) as the Spaniards called him." This was certainly an inspired thought on the part of Queen Elizabeth; but the complimentary symbolism does not end here, for on one of the three divisions of the cup is a representation of the Golden Hind being towed by four vessels. Thus Hakluyt writes of the occupants of those boats:—"Attired in white cloth of Callicut and having over their heads, from one end of the canoe to the other, a covering of thin perfumed mats borne up with a frame made of reeds, under which every one did sit in his order according to his dignitie, to keep him from the heat of the sunne, divers of whom being of good age and gravitie did make an ancient and fatherlie shew."

Lady Eliott-Drake observes of Thomas Drake: "A somewhat limited nature has to be pourtrayed in the immediate succession to a remarkably gifted one, the lesser character is sure to be unduly dwarfed by the contrast." This is true enough, but whether the succession is immediate or so far removed as to deal with descendants in our own time the effect is pretty much the same. It was not altogether wise to drag out of the past certain men and women just because they happened to be related to one of our greatest Englishmen. While the former were busy proving wills, attending to other legal matters, arranging marriages, standing for Parliament, and leading in Devon the life of an English gentleman, the great Drake himself was above the pettifogging ramifications of his far-reaching relatives. While his contemporary Shakespeare gave to English literature its crowning glory, so did Drake make that "precious stone set in a silver sea" the supreme monarch of the wave, a reign of triumph carried on by Nelson and by our Navy of to-day. We like to remember the words upon a sword given by Queen Elizabeth to Drake: "Whoso striketh at thee, Drake, striketh also at Us." We gladly part company with the five baronets mentioned in these volumes to return all the more eagerly to him who captured Spanish gold and crushed the Armada. We have found him in the work of Froude, Corbett, and Mr. Alfred Noyes. In the book before us he is almost hidden from view, and we are left very much at sea with those who carried on his name without repeating the glory and distinction of his life.

THE AUTOCRAT AT THE RIVER-SIDE

Modern Development of the Dry Fly. By FREDERIC M. HALFORD. (George Routledge and Sons. 15s.)

THE publication of a new book by Mr. Halford is an event which always arouses the keenest interest in angling circles. This is the last word on the subject of dry-fly fishing, and Mr. Halford winds up his treatise in a manner which he clearly intends to be final. The fortunate anglers who are privileged to fish for the large trout and grayling of the Itchen and Test (to whom this book is primarily addressed) are comparatively few in number. But many who are not dry-fly purists will read his book, try his thirty-three patterns of flies, discuss his methods, and argue over his conclusions—and that, let him be assured, in no hostile or captious spirit, for all anglers, of whatever school, highly appreciate the work that Mr. Halford has done for the sport which they love.

The first half of the volume is entirely admirable, a monument of patient investigation, proving the author an accurate entomologist and an accomplished fly-dresser. The illustrations of flies are excellent, and the colour-chart should prove most useful as a standard of colours and shades. The second half, where Mr. Halford sets himself the task of proving the success of his patterns, is almost necessarily egotistical. Chance seems to be eliminated, as we read of fish after fish successfully stalked, accurately covered at the first cast, played by the book, and brought to net without a mistake. We shudder to think how we should bungle such casts beneath the cold, grey eye of the master! Such fishing almost ceases to be a recreation; it becomes in his hands a sacred ritual, with F. M. Halford as its great high priest. We hear him exclaim "Procul este, profani" as we put down one fish after another with a false cast, an alarming drag, or an imperfectly cocked fly. Angling is not all joy when a critical keeper is watching to report progress; it must be a severe ordeal for a mere man with our author looking on. There is something perfunctory about the way in which he apologises for his apparently uniform success; it is his concession to the weaker brethren.

It may be that anglers in general will think Mr. Halford too dogmatic. In a case which lately gained considerable notoriety a noble witness was asked by the K.C. who was examining him, "Is that a matter of opinion?" To which he replied, "No, it is a matter of fact, and my opinions are facts." So the impression that this book leaves on our mind is that Mr. Halford's way is the only way of attacking chalk-stream trout, and that his patterns are the only possible flies to use. Yet he admits that very few of his friends have followed his example by limiting their flies to his patterns; in truth the scientific angler is the exception, if this is what science requires of him. But most people are fond of experimenting on their own account, and each has his own favourite flies; and ready as he may be to accept advice and to try new patterns, he does not as a rule like others to dictate to him: he thoroughly believes in the element of luck, and prefers to buy some of his experience for himself.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

What then, it may reasonably be asked, has Mr. Halford proved? He shows conclusively, almost ad nauseam, that he can catch big fish on his new patterns, but he does not show that they cannot be caught equally well on others. His dictum that you should on all occasions imitate as exactly as possible the natural fly on which the fish are feeding will seem to many an unnecessary limitation. It puts all fancy flies at once out of court. Yet there seems no reason why we should not make an appeal to the curiosity of a fish as well as to his appetite. The red quill has always proved very successful on our chalk-streams, and one well-known angler on the Itchen seldom uses any other pattern. But perhaps its success is due to its resemblance to the female olive (red) spinner, on which, in 1904, Mr. Halford caught more fish than on any other pattern, and perhaps the inventor of the red quill was really something of a naturalist himself. Jup's Indispensable, again, is a most useful fly; on one occasion our author was quite jealous of its success. The Wickham's Fancy will certainly die hard, also the gold-ribbed hare's-ear. If we could imagine Mr. Halford so far forgetting himself as to confine his attention for a whole season to fancy flies, we do not believe that his total bag would suffer much in consequence. This is, of course, rank heresy, but it would be rather an interesting experiment. Probably all who grant Mr. Halford's premisses must agree with his conclusions; but many good anglers will rebel in practice against his restrictions. It is even possible that he overestimates the education of his chalk-stream trout.

THE RULE OF HEALTH

Regimen Sanitatis: The Rule of Health. By H. Cameron Gillies, M.D. (Printed for the Author by Robert Maclehose and Co., Glasgow.)

In these days, when scarcely a month passes without the announcement of some new and unfailing remedy for all the ills which flesh is heir to, a book such as that which is before us is of the greatest possible interest. Dr. Gillies has been fortunate enough to discover a Gaelic manuscript which in all probability belonged to John MacBeath, a member of the family which for many centuries provided the hereditary physicians of the Lords of the Isles and the Kings of Scotland.

The text probably dates back as far as the latter part of the fifteenth century, and offers an interesting field of study to the student of Gaelic etymology. As regards its substance, it is no doubt largely based upon and owes its essential character to the ancient mediæval school of Salerno. Maxims laid down in the "Regimen Sanitatis Salerni," a rhymed treatise which issued from that school, are in close accord with those found in the present work. Thus the lines from the Salernian poem:—

> Parce mero, caenato rarum, ron sit tibi vanum > Surgere post epulas. Gomnum fuge meridianum.
> . . . . .
> Si tibi deficiant medici, medici tibi fiant
> Haee tria, meus laeta, requies, moderata dieta, afford the theme of much wise reasoning in the "Regimen."

Our worthy modern medicine-men would have us believe that all we need do to be saved from illness, old age, and death is to drink sour milk, avoid meat, live on fruit, starve, skip, and otherwise make ourselves uncomfortable. It is comforting to observe that apparently each and all of these specifics was well known to the worthy doctors MacBeath, and no doubt equally well known to the learned physicians who managed in some obscure way to keep alive the dim lamp of science through the Dark Ages. Now, according to the "Regimen," the whole duty of man is, like Julius Cæsar's Gallia, in tres partes divisa est, that is to say, Conservativum, "an intelligent understanding of the conditions of health and life, and a rightly careful application of this most useful and saving knowledge, to conserve the healthful state;" Preservativum, foreseeing a falling away from the healthy state and taking precautions accordingly; Reductivum, a leading back to health for those who, neglecting the precepts of Conservativum and Preservativum, fall into a state of ill-health. Food is to be eaten only when there is an appetite for it, and appetite should never be satiated. Dum adhuc appetitus durat manum retrahe. It is quite a mistaken notion that one ought to get drunk once a month. Don't drink with your meals if you can avoid it; but drinking with meals, like other bad habits, should be given up gradually. You should only take three meals every forty-eight hours—thus Mr. Upton Sinclair is not the first in the field with the starvation theory by many centuries. Bathe often in sweet water. Don't partake of a heavy meal late at night. Feed well in the winter, but do not indulge in overeating during the warmer months, and in summer-time eat during the cool of the day.

Quantum vis sume de mensa tempore brune, tempore sed veris eibo moderate frueris. Et calor aestatis dapibus nocet immoderatis. Autumpri fructus extremos dant tibi luctus. Drink sour milk in the summer time—apparently there were Metchnikoffs even in those early days. Food should be thoroughly cooked. Above all things remember the words of Galen, "Commedo ut vivam non vivo ut commedam." And do not worry nor give way to passion. Si vis incolumem, si vis te reddere sanum, curas tolle graves: irasci crede profanum.

Such are a few among the many wise precepts laid down for us by the "Regimen Sanitatis." The book contains a facsimile of the text, a transliteration, translation, notes, and an ample glossary.

Raymond E. Negus.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Les Psaumes de Salomon, Introduction, Texte Grec, et Traduction. By J. Viteau, Docteur ès Lettres. With the Principal Different Readings of the Syriac Version, by François Martin, Professeur de Langues Sémitiques à l'Institut Catholique de Paris. (Letouzey et Ané, Paris. 6f. 75c.)

This is a concise, clear, and judicious account of an interesting but baffling problem, or, as we should rather say, of a sheaf of problems. About the "Psalms of Solomon" nothing is certain—the time, the place, even the language of their composition are the subjects of more or less plausible conjecture. The problem of authorship, as we should have expected, has never come near being solved; one thing is certain, that the Psalmist was not King Solomon. The English edition of Ryle and James somewhat boldly gives to the work the title of "Psalms of the Pharisees," thereby assuming a certain solution of one of the minor controversies involved, as to whether the author was strictly speaking a Pharisee. It seems probable that he was, and the other probabilities are that the Psalms were composed at Jerusalem about the time of the Roman occupation of Judæa by Pompey, and that they were originally written in Hebrew, though this version is no longer existing. They have made sundry attempts to incorporate themselves into the Canon of the Old Testament, and they seem to have served to some extent in the religious Offices of the Jews at the beginning of our era. The anathemas of which they are largely composed seem clearly to be directed against the Sadducees and the Asmonean destiny; and there is a curious passage which apparently refers to the death of Pompey: "I waited not long for God to show me his ignominy, stabbed among the hills of Egypt, brought to nought more fearfully than the least of men, . . . his body tossed to and fro upon the waves, . . . and there was no man to bury him." The author believed firmly in the near approach of the Messiah; one, at least, of the Psalms is entirely occupied with this expectation, and there is a very useful chapter of introduction on the general subject of Messianism. With regard to the literary value of the Psalms there are at least two opinions—a former critic has called them "a real gem;" Dr. Viteau considers them, with certain exceptions, mediocre. They are imitations of sacred poetry by a writer impregnated with the Jewish Scriptures. Dr. Viteau suggests that this imitative character was no blemish in the eyes of the Jew, "qui se complaît dans l'intensité et l'acuité des sentiments exprimés, plus que dans leur variété." An apt comparison is made with the canticles of the New Testament, such as the Song of Simeon, the period, the language, and the ideas all justifying this parallel.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Argentine Plains and Andine Glaciers. By WALTER LARDEN. (T. Fisher Unwin. 14s. net.)

MR. LARDEN'S volume has every right to be classed in the category of useful books, although it is almost entirely free from literary or impressionistic distinction. Much information, however, is given concerning the peculiarities of Argentine farming. We are told the seasons in which the various crops are sown, and those others in which they ripen; the details of colonist labour are explained, and the ways and means of agricultural life are very fully gone into. Although valuable enough in itself, the form which the matter takes is of a nature too stilted for general interest. Considerable trouble has evidently been taken with the cataloguing of the various fauna with which the author came into contact, although the treatment of the subject is somewhat marred by the occasional introduction of philosophy such as the following:—"Who is it that has pointed out the curse that Socialism has been to ants and bees and such-like?—how it has killed all progress; a stereotyped and elementary civilisation? A community of bees may be, quâ community, superior to a community of dogs. But, as a companion, a tame bee or a tame dog? One can, for the purpose, assume the bee to have suitable dimensions. I am sure that its stupid lack of adaptability would be most annoying." Now, a very little of this will go as long a way as the author is attempting to stretch the unfortunate bee! Fortunately the volume contains very few attempts such as this amazing feat of comparison. The latter portion of the work is concerned with scenes and travel in the Andes, and the description here is good.

The photographs which illustrate the text are worthy of all praise, and those which accompany the chapter on "The History of a Locust Invasion" are of great interest. The pictures here are unusually successful and comprehensive. They include the various stages through which the creature passes, from the bunch of eggs to the voracious winged insect itself. The photographs of the baby ostriches and of the other denizens of the plains are almost equally admirable. Indeed, did the letterpress of the book attain to the level of its illustrations it would be a notable work.

Nonsense Novels. By STEPHEN LEACOCK. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

IN a mild way Mr. Leacock repeats the exploits of "Lewis Carroll," for, while in his serious moments he is a Professor of Political Economy at a Canadian University, his spare time is occupied with the construction of articles and skits which are generally humorous, and often very funny indeed. The present volume is an improvement upon "Literary Lapses"—the errors of taste which we noted in that amusing collection are here absent, and we can thoroughly enjoy the shrewd and witty manner in which the author has "taken off" various styles of story-writing.

Quotation is almost useless when so much of the effect depends on the mood induced by the accumulated paragraphs. "Gertrude the Governess," with its excruciating picture of Lord Ronald who, cut off with a shilling, "flung himself upon his horse and rode madly off in all directions," is one of the best of these "Nonsense Novels;" "Caroline's Christmas," a parody of the homely-pathetic Yuletide yarn, runs it very close; and "'Q,' a Psychic Pstory of the Psupernatural," is another laughable extravaganza. There are ten of them altogether, and only half-a-dozen times or so does a really poor witticism occur. For an hour when boredom is imminent or serious fare distasteful this book will be most welcome.

CORONATION NUMBERS

IT always seems to be expected when any notable event is toward that the Sphere in some way or another will celebrate it in true and proper form, and in the present beautiful Coronation number which Mr. Clement Shorter offers for half-a-crown the well-earned reputation is adequately sustained. The brilliant heraldic cover at once attracts attention, and is symbolical of the Mother Country surrounded by her Colonies in front of the national flag. The book is divided into five sections, which describe the "Nature of the Ceremony," "Some Historic Coronations," "King George's Predecessors," "King George's Coronation," and "King George and his Empire." There are excellent pictures of their Majesties, as well as many other facsimile portraits of previous Kings and Queens. The issue is brought to a fitting conclusion by a series of articles which deal with subjects of world-wide interest.

During the early part of last week the Sketch brought out a very dainty and interesting Summer Number, only to be followed within a few days by the Coronation Souvenir Number, which carries with it a large presentation plate in colours of King George, who is represented in the act of lighting his cigarette. The likeness is very good and most naturally taken. The book itself deals with some very interesting details, not only with regard to the King and Queen, but also in connection with those who are to take important positions in the coming ceremony. Like its contemporaries the Sphere and the Illustrated London News, the Sketch should have not only a fleeting but an historical interest for all who have the welfare of the Empire at heart, and is well worth the 2s. asked for its purchase.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

FICTION

The Trail of '98: a Northland Romance. By ROBERT W. SERVICE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

WE know Mr. Service as a poet, as the "Canadian Kipling," as one destined to reflected glory. In this, his first experiment as a novel-writer, he seems to have set before him a task to show us that he has a style of his own, and is weary, in the manner of poor mortals, of being eternally hailed by another man's name. In that respect he has succeeded amply; his book bears no more resemblance to any known work of Kipling's than has chalk to Cheddar cheese, and in it Mr. Service proclaims himself one of that great school of transpontine romance which has most completely solved the problem of laying on colours with a shovel and adding high lights with a pail.

Athol Meldrum, a young Scot of dour character, sets off for America to join a cousin on a Saskatchewan sheep-ranch. But San Francisco delights him, and, being neatly robbed of his money in that easy-going city, his yearnings for Saskatchewan fades apace, and he seeks work. After some experience of living on next to nothing, which he enjoys, he finds himself destitute in San Francisco, and is rescued by a reformed gambler called Jim. He is, however, persuaded by a prodigal son of a rich man in the East, who is amicably sowing his wild oats, to join the "Great Stampede" to the Klondike. On the boat, the human cargo which Mr. Service well describes both in humour and pathos, Athol falls in love with a Polish girl, Berna, travelling with a helpless grandfather and a villainous Jewish couple. But, on landing, the parties take different routes. The hardships of the trail Mr. Service recounts with considerable power and appropriate ruggedness. Presently Berna's grandfather is killed in an avalanche, and Athol, meeting her again beside the lake where the journey down to Dawson commences, she tells him that a "Klondike King," Locasto, is in league with the Jews to make her his mistress, and she begs Athol to marry her. The Scotch caution of that young man prevails over his love, however, and they agree to wait a year. Then follows the exciting journey down the rapids and the arrival at Dawson, where the new-comers are told that all the claims worth having are staked, and they had better go home. After a time, during which Athol has worked on one of Locasto's mines, and had his life pleasantly attempted, they find a good claim, and are soon on a fair way to make their fortunes. Meanwhile, the Jews have a restaurant at Dawson, and Berna waits at table, immaculate in that city of vice. But when the year is up Athol is in hospital with typhoid, and Berna falls by treachery into the hands of Locasto. Afterwards there are explanations, but it is apparently too late for happiness, and a melodramatic ending is conjured up to convince us of this.

In his love scenes Mr. Service does not shine greatly, and there are a few which would be better away; they are much over-written, restraint of any kind not yet being one of Mr. Service's qualities in prose composition. Nor are his characters of much subtlety. Locasto is a stage villain, Athol is human at times, Berna pleases in a shadowy way, the rest, though often convincing, are mere types. It is in the, as it were, journalistic part of his book that Mr. Service is seen at his best—in the sights and people of the trail, the miners and the sharks of Dawson, the cold, the snow, and the desperate toil. We regret that the use of another medium has betrayed our author into many literary excesses, to which in his verse he has not yielded. The novel has a habit of giving people away, but we trust that the faults of this one are not beyond easy remedy, and that Mr. Service will soon learn to handle his pen with more delicacy, and that without foregoing his great birthright of vigour and genuineness.

Revelations of the Secret Service. Being the Autobiography of Hugh Morrice, Chief Travelling Agent of the Confidential Department of His Britannic Majesty's Government. Chronicled by WILLIAM LE QUEUX. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

THERE are too many mysteries which are devoid of mystery about this volume, which is, of course, a lineal descendant of the Sherlock Holmes series. Although the composition and grammar are above Mr. Le Queux's ordinary standard, many of his other cardinal vices remain. He expends a great deal of ink and uses a good deal of paper to lead up to what the reader is induced to believe will be a most entertaining and unusually surprising climax. When all this prefatory matter has been read through, the climax is found to consist of a very ordinary series of incidents. The fact is, Mr. Le Queux requires to be taken in homœopathic doses. A story now and then from his pen in a periodical might be quite interesting, but when his output is collected into a volume of over three hundred pages, it is decidedly oppressive to those who have not brought the gentle art of "skipping" to perfection.

Vittoria Victrix. By W. E. NORRIS. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

IT speaks well for the strength of will of Mr. Norris that he could endure the task of living with the characters of this book for the length of time it took him to write of them. But there is no need for one who reads for pleasure to endure the discomfort of the company of Vittoria Victrix. This name was given, under circumstances that do not matter, to a young girl named Vittoria Torrance. She is the daughter of an English gentleman of considerable estate, who never sees her if he can avoid it, and of an Italian lady, about whom the less said the better. The hero, if there be one, is a young man named Edwin Tratham, who is thirty-one years old, an R.A., and a sculptor of world fame. If one can get hold of that idea and come to like it, there is, of course, just the chance that one might read on with interest. But when on page 4 we read that he was "at the top of the tree" and on page 10 that he was thirty-one we became somewhat incredulous. He loves Vittoria, and in the end marries her, but not before some complications crop up in the shape of the heir of an Earl and an American millionaire. However, we left them together at last, and are more than content to part with them for good.

If Mr. Norris were capable of nothing better than this we could bear with it, at least with pity, but as it is we feel the annoyance of those who look to him for better things. There is not a single strong human situation in the book from the first page to the last, and only one live character at all, the old Aunt, and she only appears about six times, and then in a quite unimportant way. We can promise those of our readers who take up "Vittoria Victrix" at least two hours of genuine boredom.

GABRIEL D'ANNUNZIO

By FRANK HARRIS

POPULARITY is the varnish of talent, as Fame is the patina conferred by Time on genius. The varnish brightens the colours, holds them together, tends to preserve the picture: but it is not otherwise important. We know all about Fame: it comes from a man's peers, and is slowly built up by generation after generation; but popularity is a sort of wind-blow, and falls at haphazard. For more than a year now d'Annunzio, the Italian poet and novelist, has been living in Paris in a perfect blare of applause. Whatever he says is noted by the papers and trumpeted abroad; his every movement is a triumphal progress. In the gay, artistic capital he is throned as a monarch and holds a sort of Court with a vast retinue of admirers. Naturally one hears now and then what one might call a cæsura in the rhythm of adulation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

At a reception one evening d'Annunzio dropped his handkerchief by chance; a young lady picked it up and handed it to him with a pretty smile: "Il suo fazzoletto, Maestro." D'Annunzio bowed and, seeing she was pretty, replied with royal amiability: "Keep it, Mademoiselle; you may keep it." The girl's smile vanished; holding the kerchief carefully between finger and thumb, she walked to the fire and dropped it on the embers. A smile spread on every face but the Italian's. Such incidents, however, hardly supply discord enough to spoil the universal harmony. On all hands D'Annunzio is hailed as a genius, a great artist, a lord of words, a master of deathless music.

Snobbishness is responsible for half the fuss, and jingoism for nearly the other half. The pyramid of praise stands on its apex, and I looked the other day to see it overthrown. For a play in French verse by d'Annunzio was announced, "Le Mystère de St. Sébastien," and it is a fixed belief of mine that no one is ever master of two languages at the same time. Accordingly I ventured to predict that the French verses of d'Annunzio would bring about an anti-climax, and tumble the gigantic card-board palace of his notoriety about his ears in hideous ruin.

At first it seemed as if this were going to happen. Monseigneur Amette, the Archbishop of Paris, warned the faithful that the play was a sacrilege; but playgoers are not pious, it appears, for on the first night the Châtelet Theatre was crammed with a cosmopolitan crowd who cheered and cheered as if a bad imitation of an old-fashioned mystery play were a world's masterpiece. The warning of the Archbishop, however, was more than justified; the only interest in the play was, as I think, an interest of indecent blasphemy. The verses moved mechanically, like eight-footed insects, without rhyme or rhythm, and for five mortal hours one listened perforce to platitudinous drivel which was broken at intervals by the antics of a scantily-clad Polish Jewess, who mimicked the Passion and danced the Crucifixion. I believe in freedom—license even—and though the whole thing was inexpressibly disgusting and fatuously stupid, after all it could do no harm.

The artistic failure should have overwhelmed d'Annunzio, but he is as chirpily complacent as ever: when interviewed he declared that there was no country in the world like France, no people like the French; French cooking, and French taste, and French manners, and French dress, and French verse, and French—goodness knows what—were the best in the world. But, who is Signor d'Annunzio, and what are his titles to honour?

In person he is insignificant: a little man of five-feet-four, or thereabouts, with podgy figure, tightly cased in ultra-fashionable clothes (open war between vanity and gluttony). He looks a typical Southerner of forty-five or fifty; his head is quite bald, his moustache preternaturally black; his nose well-formed, his eyes remarkable—large, almond-brown, vivacious, bright.

His works every Latin knows: half-a-dozen novels, all stories of passion, or jealousy, or the hate engendered by desire. Himself the hero always, half-panther, half-poet, humane-cruel; an irresolute, sensual, artist, who is utterly unable to see himself from the outside and is without any faintest gleam of humour. Now and then a woman recognisable as the Duse by cicatrices of age and the malady of an unhappy love. The figures seem to move before us as in a furnace; the half-naked bodies glowing like baked clay in the vibrating heat-mist. The prose is like a soft carpet under one's feet and silken curtains half-hiding, half-revealing.

His poems show D'Annunzio's literary gift better than his prose: they are full of pictures, full of sonorous, beautiful cadences, with now and then hints of life, suggestions of desire. His plays, on the other hand, discover his essential weakness of thought, his want of originality, of what Goethe and Carlyle called genius. D'Annunzio is certainly not a seer; but lives with unconscious complacency in all the modern conventions. An almost perfect type of the man of talent, he has a superb gift of rhythmic, sonorous speech; it is as if an ordinary, very sensuous nature had been endowed with an astonishingly melodious and beautiful voice.

Of course, the better French critics know this perfectly well; one or two indeed have been at pains to prove D'Annunzio a plagiarist, showing in detail how he has borrowed with both hands from French writers. It may be worth while just to note the results of their efforts, and add one or two little discoveries.

In 1896 there appeared in the Temps of January 26th and February 2nd a couple of articles on D'Annunzio's borrowings by M. Gaston Deschamps. M. Deschamps, helped by an Italian critic, Signor Enrico Thovex, showed that "Il Piacere" was really made up of situations, figures, and observations lifted from "L'Initiation Sentimentale" of Peladan. Any one who wishes can turn up the articles and examine the parallel passages for himself: they are countless.

In the poetry of D'Annunzio, too, the indebtedness is just as evident. The "Roman Elegies" are simply echoes of French authors. In the "Tentation de Saint Antoine" Gustave Flaubert writes:—

> Les marchands d'Alexandrie naviguent les jours de fête sur la rivière de Canope et boivent du vin dans des calices de lotus.

This is turned word for word into Italian by D'Annunzio. Here is his version:—

> I nitidi mercanti Alessandrini, > profumati di cinnamo e d'issopo, > bevean sulla riviera di Canopo > nei calici del loto, i rosei vini.

Again Flaubert writes:—

> Il est jeune, imberbe . . . et les perles de sa tiare brillent doucement comme des lunes.

D'Annunzio takes the very phrase:—

> . . . Le perle della sua tiara
> Splendeano vagamente come lune.

Or let us take the "Éducation de Saint Antoine:"—

> . . . Aux coins du dais étendu sur la tête quatre colombes d'or sont posées. . . . De la coupole pendant à des fils que l'on n'apercevait pas, quatre grands oiseaux d'or, les deux ailes étendues. . . . Un dromadaire, chargé d'outres percées, passe et revient, laissant couler de la verveine pour rafraîchir les dalles. . . . Des clochettes d'argent qu'ils portent sous la mâchoire. . . .

And here is what D'Annunzio makes of the four passages:—

> Quattro colombe d'oro con l'ali tese > in alto, tra le frange di Palmira > a invisibili fili eran sospese,
> Due dromadari, aventi in su la schiena
> Otri forati, ed une campanella > di fino argento sotto la mascella > spargean su i marmi essenza di verbena.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Or let us take the "Tentation" again:—

> Le secret que tu voudrais tenir est gardé par les Sages. Ils vivent dans un pays lointain, assis sous des arbres gigantesques, vêtus de blanc et calmes comme des dieux. Un air chaud les nourrit. Des léopards tout à l'entour marchent sur des gazons. Le murmure des sources avec le hennissement des licornes se mêlent à leur voix. . . .

D'Annunzio scarcely does more than translate this:—

> L'hanno in custodia i Saggi. A l'ombra d'un arbore immensa > candidi nelle vesti, placidi come iddii, > vivono. Un' aria calda li nutre. Su l'erbe d'intorno > rapidi i leopardi piegano i dorsi gai.
> Il mormorio dei fonti, il sussurro dei rami, il sommesso > fremito de le belve mescesi alle parole.

In fact, he uses Flaubert as his predecessors, the Italian peasants, used the antique temples, breaking them up and cutting the marbles to make doorways for their little cottages. But now and then he goes further afield. He takes even the famous couplet of Baudelaire—

> Et dans tout ce qu'il boit et dans tout ce qu'il mange > Retrouve l'ambroisie et le nectar vermeil—and renders it as follows:—

> e sappi in quel che mangi et in quel che bevi > trovar l'ambrosia et il nettare vermiglio—

But though he shows a preference for Flaubert and Baudelaire, D'Annunzio, quite willing to borrow from any one, even Maeterlinck, writes:—

> Les vierges du couvent regardaient passer les vaisseaux sur le canal, un jour de jeûne et de soleil. . . .

D'Annunzio translates this word for word:—

> Le suore, alle finestre > del convento, sul fiume > guardan passar le barche; > guardano mute e sole > mute e digiune al sole.

Again, in Maeterlinck's "Serres Chaudes" we find:—

> Les prisonniers qui entendent faucher l'herbe dans le jardin de la prison . . . ils sont pâles comme des malades qui écoutent pleuvoir sur le jardin de l'hôpital.

And D'Annunzio translates it:—

> I prigionieri assale > un' ansia: falci lente > falciano l'erba nuova,
> a la prigione intorno.
> Gli infermi (inclina il giorno) > pallidi sul guanciale, > ascoltano la piova > battera dolcemente > l'orto dell' ospedale.

In the Mercure de France for November, 1904, M. Edouard Maynail proves that the "Novelle della Pescara" are taken almost wholly from the stories of Guy de Maupassant.

The "Regret" of de Maupassant is turned into "The Dead Watch." The "Abandonné" is turned into "Il Traghettatore;" "La Ficelle" into the "Fine di Candia." Even word-pictures of de Maupassant are translated literally; he describes a donkey, and D'Annunzio copies the description word for word. Here is the passage:—

> La peau de sa tête semblait couverte d'un duvet vaporeux, comme le corps d'un poulet plumé qu'on va flamber, . . .

and so forth.

D'Annunzio translates the whole passage faithfully, only changing the chicken into a fat goose.

He even takes pages from de Maupassant's "Yvette," and incorporates them in his own story "The Return."

All this is merely amusing. We all borrow what we don't possess, but none of us can borrow above our level. We only take what we appreciate, what in some sort, therefore, already belongs to us, and so we find D'Annunzio annexing beautiful and sonorous phrases.

The real question for us is how has d'Annunzio used his borrowings? If it has helped him to masterpieces, he is more than justified. If he has failed to reach that height, he is nothing worse than an excellent translator. In both cases the reader profits.

We make too much fuss about plagiarism; the Latins, who borrowed shamelessly from the Greeks, were always pluming themselves on their originality. After all, originality can be shown even in borrowing, though the man of rich and puissant nature borrows least, for he has enough to do to get on paper his own view of life, his own passions, his own emotions.

THE MYSTERY OF SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON LIFE—I.

WHAT was Shakespeare's occupation during the years 1586 and 1594?

It is practically an insoluble query, but nevertheless a query asked alike by Shakespeareans, by Baconians, and by adherents of Dr. Bleibtreu's theory of the Rutland authorship of the plays generally attributed to Shakespeare. A satisfactory answer would decide a host of knotty points—e.g., how many months of his first year in London did Shakespeare pass standing outside James Burbage's Shoreditch playhouse, yclept "The Theatre," holding the mounts of the City gentles? How long did he undertake the duties of call-boy, scene-shifter, and prompter within? When was he promoted to the post of Reviser of Plays at the "Rose"? In spite of Mr. Sidney Lee's optimism regarding the future of Shakespearean research, it seems probable that the mystery of these eight years will never be unveiled.

The smaller units of the Elizabethan theatrical world were of little account. There were stars then as now: Richard Burbage was the Henry Irving, William Kemp the Arthur Roberts of the day. So realistic was Burbage's conception of "Richard III" that his contemporaries travestied the part; in his "Scourge of Villanie" Marston has "A man! a man! a kingdom for a man!" in his "Eastward Ho!" "A boate! a boate! a full hundred markes for a boate!"

Bishop Corbet, in his account of a visit to Bosworth Field in his "The Boreale," says that the average playgoer was so impressed with Burbage's enunciation in his personification of the King that—

> When he should have said King Richard dyed
> And called a horse, a horse, he Burbage cry'd.

Kemp was a dancer and comedian of no mean attainment; in fact the Court and the nobility seem to have run wild about him, much in the same manner as fashionable London society of the twentieth century hastened to book seats at "the Palace" last spring for Miss Maud Allan's representations of Salome. At Augsberg Kemp had danced before King Rudolph; he had also visited the Italian Court. When he set out on his Morris-dance to Norwich half London thronged the streets to catch sight of him. At Chelmsford some two hundred city folk were still amongst the crowd. At Norwich he received an official welcome from the Mayor and corporation, and his buskings were hung in the Guildhall. Tradition has it that Shakespeare impersonated

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Adam" in "As You Like It" and the ghost in "Hamlet;" the latter Rowe mentions as "the top of his performance;" but, at any rate, he must have been an actor of more than average ability or he would not have received the Royal command to appear before the Queen at Greenwich, in company with Kemp and Burbage, on St. Stephen's Day, 1594.

The Elizabethan actor masqueraded daily on his sceneless stage attired in the costume he would wear to dine or sup at his patron's board. Some of his properties in the way of apparel he may even have purchased from the former's servants, who, according to the unpublished manuscript diary of Thomas Platter, of Basle, who visited London in 1599, did a thriving trade among the players in the turnover of their masters' wardrobes. In the summer, when the aristocracy retired to their country houses, the Elizabethan actor, like his Edwardian descendant, toured the provinces, or journeyed further afield to Scotland or the Continent. But Shakespeare's name appears in no extant list of actors who visited the outlying parts of the kingdom; some commentators affirm, nevertheless, that he journeyed to Italy in 1593 and to Scotland in 1599, but this would seem to be mere guess-work, unfortunately.

During the last decade of the sixteenth century Shakespeare's position gradually became more assured; he was daily retouching, revising, and readapting the plays of his company in the small space in the Shoreditch Theatre which did duty for a library, where the soiled and torn MSS., thumbed by successive actors, were stored. Sometimes the professional "improver and polisher" of plays would be required to rewrite whole passages or recast entire scenes for the sole purpose of introducing a few topical allusions. When Shakespeare's Company was on tour, he would probably continue his work of revision in the house he rented in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate. Later, when his attendance was required at the "Rose," built by Philip Henslowe, on the Bankside, Southwark, he lodged near the Bear Garden on the south side of the Thames to be within easier reach of his new workshop, and in 1613, when his acting days were over, and he was chiefly interested in watching the histrionic display of his actor-friends on the boards of the Burbage's Blackfriars Theatre, he purchased a house some 600 yards from the stage-door to serve as a pied-à-terre when he journeyed to town from Stratford.

"The Theatre," Shoreditch, had known Shakespeare as call-boy, scene-shifter, and prompter; the "Rose" as an actor-author of no mean ability, a veritable "Johannes factotum" to his theatrical manager; but when the "Globe" opened its doors in 1599 his reputation as playwright and poet was already assured. He was no longer in the same category as Marlowe, Greene, Peele, Kyd, and Lyly, and he was on the highroad to out-distancing Dekker, Marston, Middleton, and Heywood. Other authors, too, were willing to admit his power. Meres speaks of "honey-tongued Shakespeare;" Barnefield writes of his "honey-flowing vein;" Gabriel Harvey scrawls on the flyleaf of a Chaucer folio: "The younger sort take much delight in Shakespeare's 'Venus and Adonis,' but his 'Lucrece,' his 'Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark,' have it in them to please the wiser sort." Although the Elizabethans looked down upon a playwright, a poet was a different being altogether; the former wrote for the people and was generally of the people, whereas the latter, as often as not, was a courtier and addressed his sonnets and verses to a Royal mistress or noble patron.

By piecing together the details we know of the lives of other actor-managers, and of Shakespeare's contemporary poets, we may obtain a glimpse—far-off it may be—of Shakespeare's daily environment during these years in London. But of the inner life of the man himself what do we know? And before aught else Shakespeare was human. His humanity, to use the word in its original sense, is one of his most striking features. Coming to London in his twenty-third year, full of the sensations of love, of life, and of youth, the intoxication of the city must wellnigh have overwhelmed him. The old temptations, the old desires, would be quickened and live again a thousand times more ardently than in the days of his calf-love when he courted Ann Hathaway in the Warwickshire lanes. The boy-husband had attained manhood, his virility must assert itself. He might mean to be faithful to her whom he had made the mother of his three children, and for the sake of the boy Hamnet he might try to quench the fire of passion as it throbbed through his veins; but he was in the heart of the gay city; for the first time in his life he was feeling the glorious joie de vivre, and could he have sung of human love and of human passion if he had not felt a deeper affection, a deeper desire, than that inspired within his breast during the courtship of the wife, seven years his senior? Women grew older earlier then than now; the present period of perpetual female rejuvenescence had yet to dawn.

Yet the name of no woman he loved during those years of London life has come down to us; then, as now, the mothers of the "merry begots" and "by-blows" of our sixteenth and seventeenth century parish registers paced the streets of high-gabled, two-storied, wooden houses, and instead of slinking away from the glare of the electric light, drew back from the horn-box with its tallow dip which did duty for a lantern. Yet there are whispers of scandal which show that Shakespeare was not too virtuous in his day and generation—tales at which his prudish, Puritan son-in-law, John Hall, would hold up his hands in pious horror. Manningham, in his diary under date March 10th, 1601, writes:—

> Upon a time when Burbage played Richard Third there was a citizen gone so far in liking with him, that before she went from the play, she appointed him to come that night unto her by the name of Richard the Third. Shakespeare, overhearing their conclusion, went before, was entertained, and at his game ere Burbage came. The message being brought that Richard the Third was at the door, Shakespeare caused return to be made that William the Conqueror was before Richard the Third. Shakespeare's name William.

A few seventeenth-century gossips credit Shakespeare with the paternity of Sir William Davenant, some time Poet-Laureate. On his journeys between London and Stratford Shakespeare lodged at the Crown Inn, Oxford, of which John Davenant was the landlord. This and the renowned good looks and general comeliness of the hostess are enough to give colour to the tale. Another version says that Shakespeare was godfather to the boy, and adds that he was equally attentive to his brother Robert. The latter reason for the intimacy between the poet and the Davenant family seems more probable, for in an elaborate Jacobean MS. poem on the inns and innkeepers of Oxford, now preserved at Alnwick Castle, there is no mention either of the Crown Inn or of its host or hostess.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN INDIA: A POLITICAL DANGER

THE religious problem has presented enormous difficulties in the solution of the education question in England. In India any question connected with religion is apt to assume the proportions of a political danger, for the reason that religion is the basic element of Indian life. And yet the suggestion is being made in various quarters that the Indian Government should add to its troubles in connection with Indian unrest by embarking upon a policy of religious instruction in that country. It has hitherto wisely adopted the principle of rigid abstinence from all interference with religious instruction, either in aided schools or Government schools. The education despatch of 1854, the Magna Charta on the subject, laid this down so clearly that, while recognising that religious instruction would be given in the aided schools, it distinctly enjoined the inspectors to take no notice whatsoever of any religious doctrines taught in those schools. The Government of India has, so lately as 1904, reiterated the orders that in Government institutions the instruction is and must continue to be exclusively secular.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In searching for the causes of Indian unrest the theory has been advanced that the education policy has been all wrong, that it has produced a disregard for all authority, human or Divine, and that a reformation of that policy is the panacea to be applied, the provision of religious instruction to be one of the chief items. Mr. Valentine Chirol, in his book on "Indian Unrest," has developed this theory, proposing that, while no real departure is made from the time-honoured principle of religious neutrality, time should be made available in the educational curriculum for religious instruction in each creed, and that "some supervision would have to be exercised by the State." So lately as on the 16th of March Mr. Claude Hill, C.S.I., C.I.E., in a paper on "Education in India," read before the Society of Arts, Lord Northcote presiding, discussed the subject of religious or moral training in Indian schools. He is well aware of the Education despatch of 1854 above-mentioned, and of the principles therein asserted. But he urged that the Court of Directors in 1854 contemplated that in the elementary schools religious instruction would be arranged for, and that Sir Charles Wood's despatch only laid down that we should not interfere with that branch of education. Mr. Hill's proposal is that the elementary schools under local bodies should be regarded as falling within the category of aided schools, and religious instruction should be introduced therein under Government supervision. He pointed out that this supervision would be required, at the same time mentioning an instance when the liberty to teach religion unfettered by any check was grossly abused to serve political ends. And then he advanced the astounding statements that "Inspection is not interference, Supervision is not direction," and in explanation added:—"The aim should be, by regulated instructions, to cause our educational inspecting officers, while abstaining from interference, to satisfy themselves that the religious instruction conveyed is of an appropriate, or at least harmless, character, and the regulations could be so framed as to secure that no initiative, in dubious cases, should be taken without the sanction of the local Government." He did not suggest—nobody out of a lunatic asylum would suggest—that Government teachers should themselves give religious instruction. He argued that the policy of 1854 imposed no absolute bar to the introduction of moral instruction based on religion in aided schools, that schools supported primarily by local bodies and administered by them come within that category, and that moral instruction upon a religious basis should be introduced therein. If the difficulties confronting the Government on this proposal should be found insuperable, he advocated a scheme of secular moral instruction, modelled on the work of the Moral Education League.

Against moral instruction, whether imparted orally or by moral text-books, there is nothing to be said, though the supply of sufficient qualified teachers would be impossible at first. But it is against the Government directly or indirectly arranging for, introducing, or being made in any way responsible for religious or quasi-religious instruction, that a strong protest should be made. No protest can be too strong. It is simply astonishing that a responsible officer of Mr. Hill's standing and experience should state that "inspection is not interference," and that "supervision is not direction." Both statements are absolutely incorrect. In the eyes of the people the Government is held responsible for whatever a Government inspecting or supervising officer approves. Whenever he disapproves he interferes or directs, and the Government is similarly held responsible. These statements cannot be disputed. Persons affected or displeased by the disapproval or direction of any Government officer can immediately raise the cry of "Religion in danger," and there is no cry that a seditious vernacular Press—or even the loyal newspapers—would take up with greater violence and animosity. Such a cry would unite and convulse India and lead to a civil rebellion of the entire population worse than any military revolt. An alleged interference with caste-marks led to the mutiny at Vellore in 1806; the alleged grievance of cartridges greased with the fat of cows and pigs united Hindus and Mohammadans in the Mutiny of 1857. Other instances could be collected. Every Indian administrator should know—why does not Mr. Hill know?—that the remotest suspicion of interference with the practice of any religion gives rise to petitions or demonstrations of remonstrance until relief is afforded.

The fear is that the Government, in its desire to repair the unfortunate results of its Education policy, may make a wrong diagnosis. A spirit of rebellion against all authority—political, social, parental—has for some time pervaded the world, and the teaching of selected English literature—Milton, Mill, Herbert Spencer—provided in the Indian schools has fostered this spirit therein. The parents have neglected their duty, discipline has not been maintained. It is not clear that unrest should be attributed to the want of religious education. On the other hand, the frightful danger incurred if the Government allows itself to be in any way made responsible for, or connected with, religious instruction cannot be too seriously regarded. An immense responsibility lies upon the newly-appointed Minister for Education in India. It is to be hoped that the Government will not, for the sake of popularity or "doing something," depart from the policy of rigid abstinence laid down in 1854. There are many irresponsible advisers who will tempt them to go wrong. It is their duty to avoid the political danger to which we have thought it most desirable to invite attention. Lord Hardinge, as a diplomatist, and Mr. Harcourt Butler as an emeritus Foreign Secretary should recognise and avoid the political danger.

A POEM OF JAPAN

Among those traits of Japanese life which have not yet changed under the new régime one of the most agreeable is the delight in poetry and in the making of verse.

When I crossed the Pacific from Vancouver last November, conspicuous among the newspaper cuttings brought on board at Yokohama and posted up outside the saloon was the announcement that the subject of the Emperor's prize poem for the coming New Year would be "Pine in the Snow."

As I write this I have before me a poem, written with delicate brushwork upon a long piece of paper over a yard in length and a foot wide. Towards one end of the paper with the same brush has been drawn a branch of a plum-tree with some blossom as it appears a little before the leaves come, and beyond the branch are the signatures of the writer. His name is Kurimoto, which means "Under the chestnut-tree." I propose to tell of the place where Mr. Kurimoto composed this poem, and how he came to write it out for me—a stranger.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I was staying near Kyoto, and my windows looked out upon a wood. One morning I rose early, for I was going to visit the building called the Western Honganji. Leafless trees appeared pink in the early light, and fir-trees sage green with pale red trunks. The ground was partly covered with russet leaves, but all was thinly coated with white frost and the sky was a faint azure. Where the wooded hill sloped suddenly down I could see the beginning of the town of Kyoto, which is upon the plain between the hills, but only a few gray roofs and gable-ends were visible, for a soft rosy mist hid almost everything down there.

It was a good forty minutes' rickshaw ride to the outer walls of the monastery. Beyond the great gateways a wide road leads to a moat, then there is another wall, and within this is the Western Honganji.

I left my boots on the pavement outside, walked up the wooden steps, and began to wander through the rooms of the monastery. They are among the most perfectly decorated chambers I am ever likely to see. There was the one of the wild geese with a gold-panelled ceiling covered with paintings of white clematis, and the chamber of the chrysanthemums, of which the ceiling panels are groups of fans floating in gold between cross pieces of black lacquer ornamented with brass.

The back wall of that room is divided into four large square panels, each of which is itself a sliding screen halved vertically. Between these and the ceiling there are four oblong panels of gold with filmy clouds upon them—streaks of paler gold—and as I moved to one corner a white moon appeared emerging from behind a cloud in the starless sky. The light came in very softly through the paper screens along the outer side of the corridor.

Presently a young man came up to me and, saying that he was a friend of the High Priest, asked me to speak with him, as he was learning English and would like some opportunity of conversation. He had just learned from an English book the sentence "Somebody's knocking at the gate," which made me think of master-builders.

This young man was twenty-one years of age, and had come from a distance to Kyoto, where he was a student at the University; he lived at the Honganji because his family were private friends of the High Priest, and he enjoyed the privilege of free access to its wonderful library.

He showed me the cedar doors with Kano Ryotaku's paintings of cats and white peonies, and outside the chamber of the sparrows he asked me to listen to the little squeaking of the floor as I trod upon the wide brown shining boards with my stockinged feet, and to notice how it gave two notes like the twitter song of the singing birds called Ugiusu; and he showed me one of the platforms of the "No" dance and a dressing-room with hunting scenes.

Some tea was brought to us while he talked to me about the great warrior and one-time master of all Japan, the Shogun Toyotomi Hideyoshi, who in his lifetime owned all the buildings of the Honganji. It was in one of these rooms that Toyotomi used to inspect the heads of his slaughtered enemies.

My new friend asked me to come with him to a country house where Toyotomi had once lived, which still belonged to the Honganji. This was at Fushimi, which is upon Momoyama Mountain, about half an hour from Kyoto by railway. I was nothing loth, and we went together.

When the train stopped at Momoyama station, a number of Japanese gentlemen got out, and I found that almost all of them were priests, and that, like us, they were going to the country house of the Honganji. The little irregular procession of gentlemen in kimonos with clogs on their feet passed under walled farmhouses and tea plantations, and lovely bamboo woods and houses of military officers, and near where a camellia was in bloom we all turned up a steep path with steps between key-masoned walls. At the top was a wooden gate leading into the gardens, amid which, on the slope of the mountain where Toyotomi had once dwelt, the house looked out across a very lovely valley, with a river flowing through it and a lake beyond.

On silk in lacquer frames there hung upon the wall of the chief room three characters, pronounced "San Ya Cho" (reading from right to left), which means "three-night house," and stands for the name of the house.

"Is it because you stay here just three nights?" I asked.

"Oh, no; this house has three nights because from where we are we can see on a night at full moon the moon in the sky, and we can see the moon in the river, and we can see the moon in a wine-cup, so that we can see three moons at the same time."

Tea was brought to us, and pale biscuit-coloured oval cakes with white sugar edges, and in brown of hot-stamp the word "Teikisuee," after the name of a garden at the Honganji in Kyoto.

We were sitting in the sunlight upon mats of pale gold, all the front screens of the room having been slid back, and I should say here that during all that day at Fushimi, in the house of San Ya Cho and its gardens, I saw no European clothes or furnishings.

Among the priests it happened there was one who spoke French well, and my young friend took me to this gentleman, who was sitting in the plum-tree garden composing verses, as were others of the company. It seemed that this house is always open for any priests of the Honganji to come on days of leisure. They were men of all ages, except that none was so young as my friend, and some of them were married and had families.

A special thing had attracted the visitors that day. The plum-tree garden was in a peculiarly sheltered position, and, in spite of its altitude and its wide outlook, the leafless branches were already starred with blossom, only a little warmer in colour than the cold flakes of snow that fell intermittently. It was a little festival to write poems upon this garden.

The priest who spoke French left off regarding the landscape to talk to me, and in answer to my questions told me that their religion is that of the Shinzu or "Shin" sect (not Shinto), founded by Shinran, sometimes called Kenshin daisha, who lived about seven hundred years ago, and was a prince and a Buddhist. The Shinzu sect, he told me, is the same as the sect Monto, and was originally so-called by other Buddhists.

Here the priest paused to blow his nose gravely on six paper pocket handkerchiefs.

"We worship only the Amita Buddha," he continued. 'He is our God. Our principle is absolute faith in Amita Buddha. Our faith is in God—in the absolute belief in Amita Buddha. We understand three epochs—the present, the future, and the past. Other sects believe that future happiness is dependent upon their own efforts. Other sects seek by their own efforts to attain holy reward in a future life. The sect Shinzu, on the contrary, believes absolutely that by the power of Amita Buddha alone come the pleasant things of the future world.

"At the same time we do not believe that faults and bad actions come from Amita Buddha—these are caused merely by our ignorance, and it is we ourselves that commit them. The difference between Amita Buddha and Christ is that Christ and His Father created a world, whereas Amita Buddha did not create the world."

"How do you think, then, came the creation of the world?"

"Ah! that is a great question. We believe in cause and effect and that everything is under this law. And effect becomes cause and cause produces effect, so that all things are like parts of a circle and there is no beginning and no end—voilà tout!"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We all remained silent a long time composing verses, and to each a tray of seven dishes with chopsticks was presently brought for dinner. After we had eaten we left the garden and went again into the house. There each wrote out the poem which he had composed.

And here it was that I met Mr. Kurimoto, who made the poem which has been lying in front of me all this time. He was one of the older priests, and his poems were "Utar" poems, which are of the same style as those of old time in Japan, and quite different from the "Shi" poems, the manner of which comes from China.

My young friend said of him: "Mr. Kurimoto is clever, so he makes poems and writes pictures and letters very well. He lives simply and quietly and is very fond of the game of 'Go,' which I think is like your draughts. Being a poetical man, he does not do any bad actions. I think all poetical men are good, and most priests in the Shinzu sect are poets."

Upon the leafless branches snowflakes settled and mingled with the warmer whiteness of the plum-blossom. Sometimes, at the stirring of a breeze, petals fluttered down; and through the falling flowers and the falling snow the cold river gleamed like liquid jade, while guardian hills loomed softly in the distance, a pale amethyst.

Deftly Mr. Kurimoto wrote the words with his brush from the little notes he had made of his poem:—

Oh but how lovely
Are the interlaced branches
And how the blossom
Is scented—oh how sweetly!
White in the plumtree garden.

Ogurano
Over thy water travels
Wind of the Springtime
With invitation
To the white plumtree garden.

In the mist calmly
Appearing what it is not
White snow looks flower-like.
Ah! but how much more lovely
Are the opening plumflowers.

A. H. F.

THE THEATRE

THE SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL AT HIS MAJESTY'S

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE"

Sir Herbert Tree deserves our gratitude continuously for his superb revivals of Shakespeare's masterpieces. There are some who hold that Shakespeare is more suitable for the study than for representation on the stage. There can, however, be no question that, staged as are the various plays at His Majesty's with all perfection of conception and detail—the wealth and beauty of the poet's imagination and the luxuriance of his language are enhanced, the senses are transported into the atmosphere in which the plays are laid, and poetry of vision and motion is allied to poetry of thought.

Sir Herbert Tree's presentment of Shylock is a great performance. We have seen many other actors of eminence in the part, including Phelps and Irving, but we are inclined to award the palm to Sir Herbert Tree. His performance in the Ghetto scene and in the Trial scene was powerful in the extreme. In the Trial scene he bore himself with a strange dignity, and it must be confessed that the Christians who were baiting him appeared by comparison to be utterly mean and despicable. This was particularly true of Gratiano, whose manner left much to be desired. When the play was written Jew-baiting was a robust survival, and it probably did not occur to Shakespeare that in a later age, when tolerance was firmly established, the sympathy of the audience would be with Shylock. Yet such was the case, and we cannot help thinking that a certain dignity and grace which Sir Herbert Tree imparted to his delineation was responsible for the feeling which was manifest.

Miss Evelyn D'Alroy looked charming, and was very winsome in Portia's earlier scenes. The Trial scene, so far as Portia's performance is concerned, is, we think, very absurd; and if neither Ellen Terry nor Miss D'Alroy were quite satisfactory, the fault was rather with the author than with the actress. The Duke presides at the trial, with some twenty scarlet-robed Judges to assist him. The Socialist ideal appears to have been consummated, because the Judges have presumably comfortable berths, in return for which they do nothing useful. They are never consulted, and never offer a suggestion, but watch with awed countenances a foolish youth who is delivering speeches to Shylock.

Por. Then must the Jew be merciful.
Shy. On what compulsion must I? tell me that.
Por. The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath.

And so on; very beautiful language, but the salaried Judges perhaps expected something a little more illuminating on legal problems from the "young and learned doctor" from Padua. We only make this reference to show how difficult it is for any actress to be satisfactory as Portia.

Mr. Basil Gill was a very handsome Bassanio, who spoke the verse excellently and acted with dignity and discretion. Antonio was not so good. He stood stock still whilst Shylock was reviling him in the speech beginning:—

Signior Antonio, many a time and oft
In the Rialto you have rated me.

One would have supposed that Antonio would have stamped his foot, have turned to Bassanio in disgust, or have shown some other symptoms of feeling; but Mr. Cookson took it all lying down, or rather standing still, as if, having obtained a front position to view the Coronation Procession, he was afraid to move lest someone should dispossess him of it. Mr. Cookson was also lacking in dignity in his final speech in the Trial scene. Mr. A. E. George as Lancelot Gobbo was quite good. Mr. Walter Creighton, in the very small part of the Prince of Aragon, gave a delightful representation of the quintessence of foppishness. Mr. Gerald Lawrence as Lorenzo repeated the very unfortunate habit he has acquired of snapping at his words as soon as they are uttered. This actor should certainly cure himself of a habit which inevitably recalls the action of a terrier snapping at a fly. Miss Laura Cowie, the charming Anne Boleyn of pleasant memory, was excellent as Jessica, and Miss Margery Maude as Nerissa gave a delightful performance. It is needless to add that the staging of the play was perfect.

C. C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

"RICHARD III." AT HIS MAJESTY'S

WHAT a pity it is that we do not see more of Mr. F. R. Benson in London! He is one of our very few actors who really understand Shakespeare's work and how it should be interpreted. His pourtrayal of Richard III. on Tuesday afternoon was a rare treat; it is seldom that one sees a finer piece of acting of a very difficult and complex rôle. Mr. Benson helps us to understand Richard III., and surely there never was a more involved human problem to unravel. Even after seeing the play we are at a loss to understand the motives and brutal callousness of the man. He was a freak of nature, one that, happily for the peace of mankind, is not often produced, or is at least confined at an early age to prison-walls. Richard was a great statesman, and an unscrupulous intriguer, who allowed no obstacle to stand in his way. He arrived at decisions with unique speed. His first thoughts on any subject were carried out with all the promptitude of true ability, but as these usually took the form of clearing a rival from his path by the axe, or by poison, or by some other form of murder, his name has become a byword amongst monarchs for callousness and cruelty. He is the Caligula of Rome or the Jonolia of China. The superb cynicism of his character often led to the most unexpected successes. He had the lowest opinion of women; he could handle them with unrivalled skill and make them first the innocent victims of his ambition and then the outraged instruments of his policy. At times he is astonished at the success of his audacity, and, reflecting on his success, exclaims after Lady Anne has accepted his hand:

> Was ever woman in such humour wooed?
> Was ever woman in such humour won?

His manner of winning over Elizabeth, Queen to Edward IV., is equally blatant and callous.

Richard was mad; as his body was deformed, so was his mind warped, and only his extraordinary insight into human nature together with his cunning carried him through his chequered intrigues for the Throne. Then came the end, and, to do him justice, he died like a man, or rather as a savage beast without a friend, and the common enemy of society. No one loved him, but many feared him; but once a stronger than he appeared his bolt was shot.

Mr. Benson was well supported by Miss Genevieve Ward as Queen Margaret, by Miss Violet Farebrother as Elizabeth. In fact, the whole company was excellent.

"AS YOU LIKE IT"

THIS play was produced with great success at a matinée. Every character in the delightful pastoral play was excellently rendered. The Rosalind of Miss Lily Brayton calls for special commendation. This talented actress is more fitted by nature than are some Rosalinds to play a youth's part, and yet unconsciously at intervals to display the woman's nature to everyone but a blind lover. Where all were good we should like to mention Mr. Herbert Grimwood, who, as Adam, acted extremely well. We do not remember to have seen a better. The melancholy Jacques did not deserve any pity, for, underlying his professed philosophic calm, appeared an undercurrent of robust enjoyment of life, notwithstanding its drawbacks. The moralist who can deliver himself of "All the World's a Stage" between bites of an evidently good apple is more a philosopher than a hypochondriac. We cannot say that we admire the introduction of fruitarian diet throughout the play. The scenery—especially the Forest of Arden—was appropriately sylvan, the music unobtrusive and well rendered, and the usual songs of the play were well sung. We make one criticism only. The gentle shepherd, Corin, although he looked the part admirably, was a shepherd of unusual, if not impossible, education. The whole production was most delightful, and was received with enthusiasm.

THE ROYALTY THEATRE

MESSRS. VEDRENNE AND EADIE are, it appears, without a policy. They have, at present, shown no reason why play-goers should make their way into the purlieus of Soho. Having the choice of all the money-making plays which are so obviously excellent that they have been refused by actor-managers, and being free to engage a company of actors and actresses who are far too excellent to stand on the same stages as actor-managers, they have fallen victims to the ineptitude of theatre-management. If Mr. Jerome's play was weak, Mr. Frank Howell Evans' farce is amazingly unfunny, and belongs to a type long ago dead and done with. There is only one place for "Half-a-Crown," and that is the Working Men's Institute in some belated village, in which, acted by kind-hearted local amateurs, the performance would serve a good purpose. It would raise a few pounds towards a half-size billiard-table fund, and keep field-workers out of the public-house for at least one evening. Conceive, then, the unreasonableness of "presenting" such a thing to a sophisticated London audience, except as a sort of joke.

And yet Mr. Vedrenne's name has been associated with many of the most interesting, most intellectual plays of the century. He has assisted in the production of work by Mr. Masefield, Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. St. John Hankin, Mr. Frederick Fenn, Mr. Granville Barker, Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, Mr. Douglas Murray, and Mr. George Bernard Shaw. Mr. Dennis Eadie has earned a high reputation as an actor of quiet, unemotional parts, and he has done more than well in a long list of characters to all of which he has taken imagination, finished technique, a nice personality, and intense earnestness. If ever there were two men, therefore, who were, on the face of it, admirably cut out for the management of a theatre in partnership, we had them in Messrs. Vedrenne and Eadie. Their first production failed, though not lamentably. There was much, as we said, that was very interesting in Mr. Jerome's "Master of Mrs. Chilvers." In dealing with Suffragists it dealt with a set with which the British Public has no sympathy. Their second production, in which Mr. Eadie cast himself for a part not only beneath his attention, but altogether unsuited to his method, must have come out of the portfolio of Mr. W. H. C. Nation, the former lessee of the theatre.

Already, it will be detected, we are speaking of these gentlemen in management at the Royalty Theatre as though they had retired from business. They have, of course, not done so, but their exchequer will have to be a very large one if they continue business on present lines. There is no public for "The Master of Mrs. Chilvers" and "Half-a-Crown." If Messrs. Vedrenne and Eadie cease at once to choose plays for themselves, and secure half a dozen of those plays which have been labelled dangerous, the first of them, if it is dangerous enough, will make a fortune, and they will be able to "present" the remaining five at their leisure. "Nobody's Daughter" was dangerous. Having been refused by everyone else, it registered a great and well-deserved success with Mr. Gerald Du Maurier. Nearly every play which wins success has been refused and refused and refused, and always because it is "dangerous." One of the reasons why London theatres are so unsuccessful, and its productions so poor, is because their managers define as dangerous something that contains a serious human story, dealt with strongly and courageously.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The only good thing that Messrs. Vedrenne-Eadie have done is to revive "The Cat and the Cherub." This enthralling little play, written picturesquely and with a keen sense of atmosphere, revives well. The story is thrilling, and holds the attention with ever-increasing interest. All the characters are well and clearly defined, and the murder at the end of the play is terribly grim and realistic, and one which all right-thinking people witness with perfect satisfaction. Never was there a more cringing and despicable creature than the murdered man. He is superbly played by Mr. Campbell Gullan, an actor whose name is new to us. To the life he was Chin Fang, keeper of an opium den in Chinatown, who enticed into his cellar Hoo Chee, only son of the rich merchant, Hoo King, and thus eventually brought about the epoch-making scene in the moonlight, where Wing Shee, the learned doctor, makes him understand that he knows who killed his son, Wing San Luey. Mr. Norman McKinnel added another amazingly strong portrait to his already large gallery. His work is always perfect. He is beyond question our finest character-actor. Miss Gillian Scaife improved he good reputation as Ah Yoi, and moved the audience to tears. Mr. Shiel Barry, whose versatility is really extraordinary, played delightfully as the boy in love. If "The Cat and the Cherub" were put second on the programme there might be some hope for it.

THE COURT THEATRE

The Irish Players

The opening bill, on Monday, the 5th, of the Irish National Theatre Society for their annual visit to London consisted of a one-Act play, "The Piedish," by George FitzMaurice, and "The Playboy of the Western World." The latter needs no introduction at this hour of day, but the former is one of the new plays in the repertory of the company, at least so far as London is concerned. In the way of all new movements, tentative ventures, being the natural expression of pioneers breaking new soil, have found favour with a new school that has come to earn an almost Continental recognition as indicating the way of dramatic progress. Thus it is that one-Act plays have become so much the rule at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin. Even as Wordsworth, in ruling aside the stilted diction of a poetic age outworn, found it necessary to rely on the simplest efforts, so the younger Irish dramatists, faced with a drama whose pompous methods have worn themselves to a shameless artifice that has ceased to convince even the uninitiate, have been compelled to weave a drama that is not only simple in texture, but simple in ambition. They have been wise. It has not been possible to see too far along the new road; but one step has revealed itself, and that one step (one act, one might say, and promptly crave forgiveness) they have courageously elected to take. Hence the predominance of one-Act plays. Hence, too, the lack of what one may call "intellectual muscle." It has, indeed, been part of the simplicity in acting and production; though, unlike the acting, it is not a goal in itself, but should be an isthmus to a larger continent. The challenge now to the directors of the Abbey Theatre is to prove that they have indeed been pioneers; that in leading us out of Egypt they have a Canaan for goal, and not the desert. It is a very excellent thing to be out of Egypt. The leeks and garlic have wearied on our palate. But it is not excellent to be in a desert. It begets a hunger even for leeks and garlic.

One could not say better of "The Piedish" than that it is more redolent of milk and honey than leeks and garlic, which is admirable; but it is not Canaan. The plot of it, what plot there is, deals with old Leum Donohue, who, somewhere about the age of fifty, left his daughter Johanna to live with his other daughter, Margaret, and forthwith began making a piedish, which he had deliberated thirty years, and having laboured at it for another twenty years, is discovered at the point of death with the piedish uncompleted. Asleep, or unconscious, he is put into the settle-bed to die, and the priest is sent for. Instead of dying, however, he awakes, and his face becomes radiant at the sight of his piedish, which he rouses himself to continue. Margaret and Johanna are, very naturally, deeply concerned at this. The priest having been sent for, surely it is the proper business of him to die like a decent man, and not put the "great shame" on them of having brought his reverence out on a useless journey. Die he will not, however, so long as the piedish continues incomplete; and the priest, on his arrival, is very properly annoyed and perplexed at the state of affairs, which neither Johanna nor Margaret, nor the latter's two sons, Jack and Eugene, can make intelligible to him.

So far so good. Or rather so far and not quite so good as it might have been. The dialogue too frequently hangs fire disastrously, particularly the over-lengthy bicker between Johanna and Margaret. When we say that Johanna was played by that really great actress Maire O'Neill, and that yet her speech invited a wandering attention, it will be seen that something was deficient somewhere. Dialogue, to grip, must be pertinent or impertinent, and the speech between the sisters too often is neither. That between Jack and Eugene is much better, and also shorter. Yet, having arrived so far, we wonder when the climax is coming—of course, in the death of old Leum and the breaking of the piedish; but that is so much foreseen that something must be superadded to make the climax complete. Now, here a curious thing arises. The something more is given, not by Mr. FitzMaurice in the matter of the play, but by Mr. Arthur Sinclair in the matter of the acting. We have seldom seen a piece of acting so extraordinary as the death of Leum Donohue in the hands of Mr. Arthur Sinclair. Simple, unstrained, unrhetorical in speech and gesture, the writhing of the body, the twisting of the limbs, and the slow, unhasting, agonised stumble of speech, as in paroxysms of pain the old man besought God or devil for time in which to finish his piedish gripped the soul with attention. But it was not in the play; it was Mr. Sinclair. Mr. Sinclair's excellence was the play's deficiency. No! "The Piedish" is not Canaan. It is even a little insipid, which is to say it is free of leeks and garlic; but it is also to say it is too free of milk and honey.

Of "The Playboy" it is too late to speak in detail. Over four years ago it came out to perplex, mystify, and amaze; but now it has won to something of understanding. It has even become the proper thing to praise it, and profess complete comprehension with regard to it, and here a danger has beset the play of which the present production gives an unfortunate instance. For there is a certain characteristic in all these Irish plays. Some may term it a lack of resolution, some a lack of characteristic, others a lack of dramatic energy; but in truth it is that essentially Irish mental manner of brushing past externals to the main psychic portents.

In this J. M. Synge was fairly typical of the school though in many ways he dwelt outside it. What a wonder it is to see the sunshine of hero-worship pouring on Christy Mahon's newly-emerged, fritillary soul, and to behold it widening to self-assurance in that warmth of praise! There are some who hold that "The Playboy" is a wayward and frail achievement in Synge's work; and by that word they seem like men oppressed by a spirit of contradiction, for who that has seen the inner beauty of this work can ever regard it lightly thereafter? It is possible to understand those who, finding no dramatic stresses in it, but rather a strange incommensurable lustre, dismiss the whole of Synge's work. But it is not possible to understand any who accept the rest, and yet miss the beauty of "The Playboy." Surely, indeed, it has the brackish irony Synge flavoured all his work with in varying proportions. And this is not an element that woos with siren tongue. Yet it is Synge.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is here fault has to be found with the present production. We are very sure Synge himself would never have favoured it. There is, it is true, rich humour in the play; but it is a humour that is more mordant than relaxing. Nevertheless, it was played throughout almost as though it were broad comedy. A wave of laughter—sometimes a very distressing wave of laughter—accompanied it always; whereas it should have been played gravely and with broad intensity. Laughter there should have been surely, but such laughter as is afraid to trust itself to the throat and lips, moving through the mind in gentle accompaniment of an almost mordant vision. For "The Playboy" is no gentle candy; it is like a nut, rich and bitter. It is an unhappy irony that when "The Playboy" is winning its way it should be popularised.

To clear all initial fault-finding, it should perhaps be said here that Mr. Fred O'Donovan was not the best of Christy Mahons. We have not seen him in this part before, and we consequently puzzled not a little at the energy he put into his words and actions at times. It was not happy, and for two reasons. First, because he missed thereby that quiet, unobtrusive, rhythmic beauty which makes one turn from the London West-end theatres to these Irish Players as from a hot and glaring desert to cool, grave waters; and secondly because he missed that winsome wonder and slowly expanding musical flower of speech that is Christy's essential beauty. It was he who was chiefly responsible for the farcical element in the play, mainly because he had not the strength of soul to cease from being restive. Miss Maire O'Neill and Mr. Arthur Sinclair, in their original parts of Pegeen Mike and Michael James, were, of course, a joy to hear and see. Never once did they haste in their speech; never did they move an inch nor raise a hand without absolute occasion. To say of them that they perfectly exemplify their school, and of their school that they perfectly exemplify it, is to praise it and them with rare fitness. Mr. Sidney Morgan as old Mahon, and Mr. Kerrigan as Shawn Keogh, were newer in their parts, but they acted them well. So also did Mr. O'Rourke as Philly Cullen and Mr. Wright as Jimmy Farrell, the first of whom was in his original part. Miss Eileen O'Doherty as the widow Quin has a difficult part to play by reason of its contrasted energy. She filled it well, however. It will be strange if these Irish players fail to win them audiences.

By the courtesy of Messrs. Maunsel, we are enabled to draw attention to their new edition of "The Playboy" at 2s. 6d. net. There is room for such an edition, for not all can purchase the collected issue.

MUSIC

Musical Congresses, whether they partake or not of an international character, are institutions of which we must all speak with respect; and if every address delivered at the Congress recently held in London had been as stimulating, useful, and agreeable as that of Sir Hubert Parry on "Ugliness," even Matthew Arnold might have admitted that a Congress could be a desirable thing. But the arguments of the most eminent professors at a Congress would be put aside for another day's reading by the majority of musical people when anything so exciting as the production of a new opera by Puccini claims attention. So, with every suitable apology to the eminent musical scientists who are London's guests, we will leave them to their discussion of æsthetic problems, and try to answer the question, now being put by every amateur whether he has been to Covent Garden to hear it or not, "What do you think of 'The Girl of the Golden West?'" The shortest and simplest answer is that the first Act was decidedly interesting and effective, the second rather tiresome, and the third so musically ingenious and so admirably "set" as a stage picture, that in spite of the deplorably fatiguing conclusion, it remains quite a pleasant memory.

The arrangement as an operatic book of the story of Minnie and her friends the miners, has been well done. It is very melodramatic and highly improbable; it is steeped in a sentimentality so old-fashioned as to be almost novel and refreshing in these truthful days, and it desires, as ardently as the Fat Boy, to make our flesh creep. But what does all this matter to musicians? To them, we hope, it is the music that counts, and how many operas are there, we should like to know, whose musical value depends very much on their libretto? Real composers, whose musical thoughts must come out, have written, and will continue to write, music that is worth hearing to the weakest, most stupid "books." The characters in "The Girl of the Golden West" may be old friends with new faces, and their doings may recall the proceedings now of the desperadoes in a "twopenny dreadful," now of the converted villains in a tract, but it does not follow that the real composer who takes it in hand to give musical illustration to a story of this kind will be inspired by it only to give us what is conventional and tiresome. He may make the dry bones live, and lead us to the opera-house to enjoy his music and be excited by it in spite of the story-teller and his unavailing attempts to thrill us by his antique tricks. We hear that some people consider the "book" as the best part of Puccini's "Girl." They have even spoken of it as a "good book spoiled by the music." Such a judgment seems to us astounding. The book has plenty of incident, of "situations," but they are not situations in which we can pretend to be interested, we can foresee them all beforehand.

To this sentimental melodrama Puccini may not have written great music, he may, as we think he does, respect himself rather too much in it, but he has certainly been as successful as the most hopeful could have expected in creating the right "atmosphere" by his music, and while faithfully dealing with the various situations of horror, he has not striven to make them worse. We could pardon the repetition of his many mannerisms for the sake of this manifestation of self-denying virtue. And, further, the story is only bearable on condition of its being told rapidly. Puccini has seen this (no doubt his librettists saw it too), and he carries the audience on with the utmost briskness, only pausing to introduce a lyrical episode very sparingly. Nothing is easier to this clever Italian composer than to write honeyed tunes, whether he draws them out or presents them in snatches. In this new opera he has spared us that torrent of facile tune which makes one so anxious not to hear "Bohême" and "Butterfly" too often, and some portion of which we could well spare in "Tosca." He shows that his old and very remarkable power of making the orchestra his best interpreter is in no sense weakened—nay, we think that in "La Fanciulla del West" the power is more evident than in any of his works except "Tosca"—there he has relied more than ever upon the orchestra for the effective illustration of the dialogue, but he does not rely so exclusively as of old upon "colour" effects; his weaving of themes seems much more intentional, and some of the themes themselves, though not, as we have said, of the kind that everybody can hum at once, have more real force than many of his most popular melodies.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

One would hesitate before saying that Puccini is chiefly successful as a writer of music which is coarse rather than refined in quality. He can, of course, be amply tender and delicate when he chooses. But, on the whole, he has seemed in the past to be more thoroughly himself when engaged in writing music that has strength—perhaps a crude strength. In fact, he is at his best when his methods are rough and ready, for then they have breeze and spontaneity. In the new opera the strong unrefinedness of touch has been of great value. Minnie and her men are no wearers of kid-gloves (though Minnie, with charming folly, tries to get into a pair when expecting her lover), and the first Act is undeniably happy in the way the music suits the scene. Whether miners, anywhere or at any time, were the sort of people to sob and throw themselves into each other's arms because a wandering minstrel sang about "home" is a question we are not careful to answer. The miners whose favourite haunt was the "Polka" Tavern are said to have so behaved, and the music of this scene is as tender and touching as anything Puccini has written. The valse scene is charming because it is so simple; the love duet, in which the valse theme appears again, is quite interesting, if sentimental; indeed the only bit that "drags" in this Act is the wooing by the rather conventional Sheriff Rance. The second Act is not so successful. We are perhaps a little tired of the valse theme now, and the effective enough music in which Johnson declares his passion is spoiled by the tiresome reiteration of one of Puccini's favourite devices, soprano and tenor singing it in unison with a liberal use of high notes.

The scene of the shooting, the game of cards, &c., have only the merits of rapidity and roughness. The music is not really fine and dramatic. We were relieved when the curtain came down, for we had not been impressed. But the scene of the last Act was so good as to excite pleasant anticipation that the music would be as clever as the art of the scene-painter, and so it turned out. The orchestra (which in one part of the card scene, we ought to say, had been fearfully appropriate) began by being as clever as it is at the opening of the third Act of "Tosca," and, though one was constantly reminded of the manner of Debussy, there was always the Puccini influence paramount. The Italian may be indebted to the Frenchman, but always in a perfectly legitimate way. The music is consistently vivid, and the lyric outburst of Johnson when at the gallows' foot is sincerely felt passion. Minnie's pleading for her lover's life is not nearly as sentimental as we are sure it would have been had Puccini written it in the days of his "Bohême," so that we were carried on by the musical interest of the Act, and full of praise for its masterly construction, till, the pleading having prevailed, the hero and heroine took their leave of the weeping miners on so prolonged an E flat that we almost wished Minnie had not arrived in time to save her tenor.

If Signor Puccini must be congratulated on an opera which we think on the whole an advance upon "Bohême" and "Butterfly," though we do not anticipate for it a popular success equal to theirs, the directors of the Opera House must also be given warm praise for their execution of the work. We think we have seldom seen an opera so full of bustle and rapid dialogue so well played all round. Of course, Mlle. Destinn was very well suited by the music as Minnie, and for an operatic actress she really acted well. Signor Bassi, too, was quite a competent lover, and M. Gilly did admirably as the Sheriff. But we were most of all struck by the excellence of ensemble among the miners and the rest. Messrs. Zucchi, Marcoux, Alan Turner, Warnery, Verheyden, Sampieri, d'Oisly, Lheureux, Sargeant, Malatesta, Huberdeau, Burke, Defrère, Mlle. Bourgeois—they all deserve to be mentioned, for all were so uncommonly good, and M. Crabbé sang the "Home" song beautifully. Of course, Signor Campanini and his orchestra were brilliant.

ART

At the Modern Gallery in New Bond-street Mr. Herbert J. Finn is exhibiting some water-colours of "The Thames," &c. The particular quality in the best among these pictures is to be found in their colour, as well as in a certain largeness—of effect, not of treatment—and a suggestion of atmosphere, inspired no doubt by Turner. Most definitely reminiscent of Turner are "Golden Light" and "Richmond," the famous valley of the river under the hill. In "Hungerford Bridge," however (unhappily catalogued as "A View from Hungerford Bridge"), one feels that the realisation is closer to the idea; but then the idea is a lesser one, for in most of these pictures the artist has attempted a great deal. One is surprised, therefore, to find that in several instances—notably in "Oxford from the roof of the Sheldonian Theatre"—he has allowed himself to become almost topographical. The Exhibition includes some interesting etchings.

The newly-formed little club to be known as the XIX. Club is fortunate in numbering Miss Phœbe Stabler among its members. Her exquisite little plasters and bronzes—the "Fagot Woman," the "Grannie," "Sauce," and the tiny "Sleep"—lend a special attraction to the Exhibition now open at Messrs. Wilde's Galleries in Mount-street. There is a somewhat unique individuality about them all, even to the simple little coloured earthenware called "Bath Towel." Miss Edith A. Hope, a pupil of Mr. Frank Brangwyn, contributes some good, strong work, a collection of etchings in which her own individuality has not been overpowered by that of her master. Mr. Herbert Bedford's miniatures, Mr. F. F. Ogilvie's finely-treated water-colours of Egypt, and Mr. Stacy Aumonier's careful landscapes complete the Exhibition.

The portrait of the German Emperor, by Mr. Philip A. László, now being exhibited at Messrs. Agnew's Gallery on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution is naturally attracting some attention at the moment. The painting of Royal robes and regimentals with a due regard for dignity is by no means an easy task, however kingly the wearer. Mr. László has not succeeded in doing much with the appurtenances of Royalty in this case. The strongest part of the portrait is the face. The study which hangs near by promises more than the finished picture it is true, but of studies that may often be said. There are a number of other portraits of well-known persons in the room, all of which are treated with the easy fluency which the painter has always at his command.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By Lancelot Lawton

SWEEPING REFORMS IN RUSSIA

Since, some weeks ago, I wrote in these columns describing the remarkable era of prosperity that has dawned upon Russia the subject has attracted considerable attention in the daily press. Dating from the conclusion of an agreement in 1907 defining the interests of Russia and Great Britain in all parts of the world, the sentiment between the two countries has developed an unmistakable warmth. The Entente has not been without its practical value. The Russian Government and people have welcomed the introduction of British capital, and as a consequence enormous sums of money have been invested in Russian enterprises. It would be no exaggeration to term this year in London an essentially Russian year. Russian artistes are literally taking the London stage by storm, Russian officers are to make a bold bid for honours at the Olympia show, and hundreds of Russian sightseers are crossing the Channel to witness the Coronation and its attendant ceremonies. Next year we are promised an Anglo-Russian Exhibition. Apart from the political value of such intercourse, the mingling of the two peoples at social functions will tend to familiarise them with each other and will lead to a proper appreciation of national qualities and characteristics.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It so happens that, so far as her internal conditions are concerned, this growth of sentiment is coincident with a happy change in the fortunes of Russia. In a previous contribution to THE ACADEMY I was able to show that Russia has completely recovered from the effects of war and revolution, and that she is now in the enjoyment of a period of unparalleled prosperity. A handsome surplus, following upon two bounteous harvests, enabled the State to undertake agrarian reform of a sweeping and far-reaching character. It will be recalled that the memorable Ukase of 1906 allowed the peasant to withdraw from his commune, and gave him the right to require that a certain portion of land should be permanently assigned to him as his individual property. In order that the true significance of this provision should be thoroughly understood it is necessary to present briefly some historical details in regard to the Russian land system.

Only fifty years ago the Russian peasants were serfs. It was due to the wise statesmanship of Alexander II. that their liberation was accomplished. But when they ceased to be the serfs of the landowners they became the slaves of the commune. They were compelled to abide by the laws and regulations of the commune, their land was allotted to them and parcelled out by the commune, and the methods of farming were to all intents and purposes ordered by the primitive customs prevailing in the commune. In short, initiative was stifled, and agriculture as an industry made no real progress. In face of these conditions, it is not surprising that the "three-field" system of farming should have been perpetuated. This system requires that large areas of land should be left to lie fallow, and necessitates the farms being placed at a considerable distance from the homesteads. The critics of Russia have again and again contended that her agrarian problems were of so complicated a character, and were so firmly rooted in custom, that nothing short of an upheaval in the shape of a successful revolution would lead to their satisfactory solution. In the first place it was urged that the land hunger of the peasants could under no circumstances be appeased. In this connection it was pointed out that the most successful results were obtained from lands farmed by private owners, who employed the scientific methods of crop rotation, such as find favour in the more advanced countries of the West. The conclusion was rightly drawn that the transference, on any considerable scale, of private lands to the peasants who adhered to the antiquated "three-field" system would result in a diminished yield, and would therefore be disastrous to the finances of the country. Then it was argued, with but little regard for accuracy, that the State itself could not satisfy the demand; for, it was alleged, the property at the disposal of the State consisted only of dreary swamps and forests in the barren North.

So far the tangible benefits resulting from the policy pursued by the Government prove in a striking manner that the difficulties in the way of creating a happy and prosperous peasantry are by no means insurmountable. Within $3\frac{1}{2}$ years of the memorable Ukase of 1906 over 21 per cent. of the total peasant landowners in forty provinces had intimated their desire to leave their communes with the object of becoming proprietors of their own allotments. It is not difficult to imagine that a people accustomed to common village life, common crop rotation, and common pasture are reluctant, mainly from the point of view of expense, to embark upon separate farming enterprises. Even to-day farms without farmhouses are in themselves looked upon as sufficiently startling innovations. In spite of this circumstance no efforts are being spared to bring about a more convenient redistribution of land. That success is already well within sight is evident from the fact that between 1907 and 1909, of the total number of applications for individual tenure in forty-six provinces, those involving the redistribution of the land of whole villages amounted to no less than seventy-six per cent. Under a system of easy payments, extending over fifty years, the peasants are allowed to acquire plots belonging to the State. Moreover, peasant credit associations, financed with funds from the State bank, have been formed. The annual turnover of these institutions represents the enormous sum of twenty-one millions employed in the purchase of land, cattle, implements, and the building of houses. Furthermore, with a view to enabling the peasants to hold back stocks when the market prices are unfavourable for selling, considerable sums of money are advanced on the security of grain. And, finally, official instructors are sent out into the villages for the express purpose of inducing the peasants to abandon their primitive methods in favour of crop rotation.

The success which is attending the policy of generous reform is making itself manifest in many directions. For example, since 1900 the crop area sown has increased over thirteen per cent., and to-day, after the United States, Russia ranks first as a consumer of agricultural machinery. Then, by encouraging emigration to Siberia, the State is endeavouring to relieve the so-called land famine, and at the same time to develop, as well as protect from outside aggression, the distant regions of the Empire.

By the year 1915 the great Amur railway, which is to give Russia a route to the Far East over territories exclusively her own, will be completed, and many thousand acres of rich soil will be brought well within the reach of her hardy pioneers. Thus it may with truth be said that Russia is rapidly approaching a final solution of the problems of her land. Only when we remember that these problems affect the welfare of no less than eighty-seven per cent. of her population, and that all the ills which have hitherto afflicted the country are traceable to their existence, can we realise the enormous character of the reforms now in progress throughout the length and breadth of the Empire. A prosperous agricultural community will lead to the development of industry and of State enterprises in the form of much-needed roads and railways. With the spread of communication will come the growth of educational influences. At present rigorous climatic conditions, and the enormous distances that have to be covered by sledge or on foot over highways that are nothing more or less than mere tracks, tend to retard effectually the education of the masses. But experience has proved that there are no more precocious children in the world than the Russian peasant scholars; and it is beyond all doubt that the granting of individual liberty to their parents will produce in the next generation a splendid race of well-educated and well-trained men whose destiny it will be to raise Russia to the full glory of her powers, as one of the greatest Empires that this world has ever seen.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE SITUATION IN ALBANIA

The revolt in Albania has suddenly assumed alarming proportion. The war-like tribe of the Merdites, numbering ten thousand first-class fighting-men, has taken up arms against the Sultan, and the proclamation of a provisional Government has quickly followed. This startling development, amid the anarchy already prevailing throughout Albania, threatens serious complications. Europe has long recognised that the situation on the Montenegrin frontier was a menace to peace. The suspicion was rife that the Turkish forces were in excess of reasonable requirements, and that the campaign against the insurgents was in many instances characterised by the barbaric furies which were so reprehensible a feature of the military operations of the former régime. At the same time the Turks were incensed with the hospitality shown in Montenegro to fugitive Albanians, as well as with the sympathy exhibited generally in the country with the cause of the rebels. Russia has already thought it necessary to make her attitude perfectly clear in Constantinople. Her recent Note plainly indicated a resumption of a watching brief in the Balkans and a determination to preserve at all costs the status quo. When we consider all these underlying currents, in conjunction with the fact that the Merdites are Roman Catholics who acknowledge Austria rather than Turkey as their protector, it will be realised that the outlook is fraught with danger to the world's peace.

THE LESSON OF THE CONFERENCE

The most important topics on the agenda of the Imperial Conference have now been fully discussed, and it must be confessed that the results are somewhat disappointing to those who were sanguine enough to anticipate that it would be possible to devise some machinery whereby the Colonies would be kept constantly in touch with the policy of the home Government in regard to the foreign relations and higher defence of the Empire. True, a definite promise has been given that in the future the Dominions shall be consulted beforehand—not afterwards, as too often appears to have been the case in the past—with reference to negotiations for international agreements affecting their interests. This wise and timely provision is tantamount to a positive assurance that our Colonies shall henceforth be admitted to an active share in the shaping of foreign policy; for it is impossible to conceive any broad international covenant which would not bear directly upon the interests of the Empire as a whole, and therefore upon the interests of each and every individual unit. That a similar interpretation of the Government's promise has been accepted in the Colonies is manifest from the cabled comments of the Press. The view is held that Mr. Fisher has scored heavily in securing such an undertaking, and particular reference is made to the possibility of its satisfactory operation in future agreements with Japan.

Up to the present, however, the Conference has not succeeded in elaborating a machinery which would facilitate a free and constant interchange of views in London between delegates of the Colonies and the home Government. As I pointed out last week, the High Commissioners are looked upon as confidential agents rather than councillors of Empire. At present their duties may be compared to the combined offices of Ministers-Plenipotentiary and Consuls-General. Beyond representing the views of their Governments to the Colonial Office, they take no active part in the shaping of Imperial policy; and, save that they have at heart the welfare of the Empire as a whole, it would be idle to pretend that any one of them is keenly absorbed in the affairs of the other.

When the delegates of the Colonies were recently admitted to the deliberations of that eminent body the Defence Committee the opinion widely prevailed that a common policy had been agreed upon in all essential matters connected with the safety and integrity of the Empire. Yet only a few days later we have Sir Wilfrid Laurier declaring that if a Dominion insisted on being consulted in regard to matters which might result in war the obligation would be imposed on that Dominion of taking part in the war. Here the attitude of the Canadian Government is presented with staggering bluntness, and, to speak with equal candour, it must be confessed that this attitude is a very unfortunate one. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has only repeated with emphasis in London what he has said on a previous occasion in Canada. But in this way he has brought the truth home to our own doors in a startling manner, and the heart of the Mother Country can only feel the sadder for his words of warning.

Let us realise at once the true significance of Canada's fixed policy on the supreme issue that has been raised. Let us not blind ourselves to the fact that it is a policy which is bound to lead to the quick development of the separatist idea, and, in certain eventualities, one that might bring about an open rupture between Canada and the Mother Country. We may well pause and ask ourselves, Is it conceivable that any statesman owing allegiance to the British Throne should deliberately suggest, and repeat the suggestion, that in case the Mother Country became involved in war Canada might express her disapproval of the cause and seek to remain neutral? Is it conceivable that a Daughter Dominion could stand on one side with arms folded while the Mother Country was engaged in deadly strife with the enemies of Empire? With relentless candour we must follow Sir Wilfrid Laurier's statement to its logical end. The Canadian Premier has already told us that his Government must approve of the cause of war before deciding upon participation. But assuming for the sake of argument that approval is withheld, what then? Will Canada, while flying the British flag, seek to enforce her neutrality even against the ships of his Majesty's Navy? And can it for a moment be imagined that any Power at war with Great Britain would accept a declaration of Canada's neutrality? It is clear that the policy enunciated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier strikes at the very foundations of Imperial unity. It is unworthy of his reputation as a great statesman, for, although it may not mean so much, it plainly infers disloyal isolation in certain eventualities.

Doubtless it will be said that he is merely talking in the abstract, that the contingency hinted at is never likely to arise, and that, come what may, the fervent loyalty of the Canadian people will be proof against the least suggestion that savours of disaffection towards Imperial aims. In all these arguments there is a considerable degree of plain, honest truth. At the same time Englishmen the world over will wish that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had never spoken. Indications point to the determination of the home Government to pursue a fatal policy of laissez faire—in other words, to leave well alone lest in its stead they should substitute something far worse. But surely the hour calls urgently for a statesman who will convey to the Colonies in convincing language the simple truth that the Mother Country's only concern is for her children, and that the mere idea of an Empire divided against itself is utterly unthinkable? We know that the loyal sentiment in the Canadian people is above suspicion, but with the added knowledge that they have at their head a Premier of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's type, a type embodying all the cautious, all the self-preserving, self-seeking instincts of the individualist, then it would be folly of the worst kind to ignore the stern realities of the situation. It is difficult to imagine that, as a result of the utterances of their Premier, the Canadian people will allow the impression to go abroad that some day in the hour of the Empire's crisis they will hold aloof from the Mother Country and from their Sister States. As I have already implied, this aloofness could not be of temporary duration; it could only be brought about by separation, and separation, let it not be forgotten, at a critical period when the rest of the Empire would be embarrassed. In the belief of many responsible individuals the Conference will have failed ignominiously in its mission if it does not create a family council for the maintenance of constant intercourse. By this means, and by this means alone, will it be possible to give our Dominions beyond the seas a proper measure of control, and with it an adequate realisation of Imperial responsibility and Imperial loyalty.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

HOLIDAYS may be agreeable—it is probable that they are even useful—but they are not business. Stockbrokers report that they cannot find either investors or speculators. Investment business is usually dull at this period of the year, but the speculator should be active; at present he is idle. The only market in which any movement can be discerned is the Yankee section, and English-people are afraid of this market, and in this they are wise, for the big bankers have a habit of leaving us with stock right at the top. The financial clouds that are gathering over Canada may pass away, for the harvest will be a record, and this will give the farmers funds with which to pay off mortgages and buy fresh land. But the position is by no means clear, and wise people who hold Canadian securities should take advantage of the present high prices to sell out. The speech of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Carriage Works showed Canadian politicians in a strange light. This famous company sent in tenders for a bridge and paid £100,000 deposit, which the Government kept six months. The order was eventually given to a local firm, without tender and on a different specification. There are already very unpleasant stories going round as to the honesty of Canadian politicians, and it is of the utmost importance to the Canadian Government to keep a good name amongst English investors. The story told by Mr. Frank Docker to his shareholders was not a story of which Canada can be proud. I do not wish to say too much about Canadian finance and Canadian financiers, but the British public, usually so shy of anything Yankee, ought to understand that the methods of Canada are only a shade more respectable than those of a third-rate Wall Street House. They cannot compare with the big Bankers of New York in either honesty or soundness.

There have been no issues during the past week except the Blaenavon Company's issue of debentures, which is an excellent example of an Iron and Steel debenture, and is sound of its class.

Almost every promoter in the City has a scheme ready to float as soon as the holiday week has ended, but some find difficulty in getting the underwriting. All the cliques that make a special feature of underwriting have their boxes full of scrip, which they must sell before they enter into any new schemes. England is prosperous: she is making money, saving money, and is sanguine as to the future, but she is "dead off" new ventures. Nothing tempts the subscriber to new companies except a sound, gilt-edged security yielding well over 4 per cent. As these are scarce, we seldom see a successful issue.

MONEY remains plentiful and business dull amongst the bill-brokers. But we shall see no reduction in the Bank Rate until the turn of the half-year, and not then if the New York bankers decide upon the withdrawal of their funds. This is a certainty if the excitement in Wall Street continues.

FOREIGNERS are not a market in which English investors dabble. Tintos are the rich man's market; millionaires lay in a stock of Tintos when they are low in price and are satisfied to get 3 to 3½ per cent. on their money and the chance of doubling it in a few years. Such a chance occurs to-day. Tintos are low. The Copper Combine is an accomplished fact, and those who lock up Tintos may see them over 100 in two years' time. But it is not for the small speculator. Perus should be sold. The gamble here appears to have come to an end.

HOME RAILS.—There is no bull account here, but the House possesses a reasonable supply of stock which it will sell to the public as soon as the holiday traffics are published. The speculator has not much chance in this market to-day, for the contangoes kill business. The gambler is compelled to dabble in rubbish like Little Chats and Dover A. He takes a turn at the Great Central junior stocks occasionally, and last week saw both A and B pushed up. They should not be bought just yet, but when the reaction comes they are a safe buy. Investors cannot make a mistake in buying London and North Westerns, Great Northerns, or North Easterns; all must gradually appreciate and all give over 4 per cent.

YANKEES.—The Wall Street gambler will not be denied any longer, and he is now buying as hard as he can. The harvest both in grain and cotton will be good, and this means good traffics both for the Prairie lines and the Northern cotton carriers. Prices to-day of twenty leading lines work out at 121. In August, 1909, they were 134, then they gradually fell till, in June, 1908, they stood at 97·96. In November, 1907, they touched bottom at 81·41. On December 11th, 1906, they were 137; January 22nd, 1906, 138, which was the record highest, the record lowest being 41·82 in August, 1896. So we see wild variations in such a table with prices at a very reasonable level considering the general bad trade all over the United States. Gambling in Yankee Rails is a form of excitement that needs a long purse and a cool head. It seems late in the day to come into the rise, but we may see a ten dollars jump in some stocks. Chesapeakes are to be quoted in Paris, and sooner or later all the leading shares will be dealt in in the Combine. This will give a solidity to the market which it has hitherto lacked.

RUBBER shares were bought back by the bears, and this sent up prices, but with raw rubber under 4s., and little chance of any upward move, I see very little future in the rubber market. The present holders of good rubber shares are satisfied to hold on, and they do not sell even on the worst days. Dealers dare not remain short for any long period, and their spurts of buying back stiffen a dead market. Rubber as an investment has advantages when you can buy to pay ten per cent., but at the present price of raw rubber very few of the leading shares will pay holders ten per cent. on next year's dividends.

OIL shares are always getting shocks. The Maikop Victory fire was very annoying, but shows oil speculators what dangerous gambles oil shares are. I am told that the oil war will shortly end, and that Shells are worth holding. I have heard this tale before. Still, with the war ended, and the oil trade in the East on a sound basis, Shells are not dear to-day. I am not, and never have been, in love with Maikop. I cannot advise a purchase, for I think all prices too high.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS are not in favour, and the public waits the efforts of the magnates before it ventures upon a gamble. Sir Abe Bailey showed his good sense by getting out of his mining shares in the last rise, and they say that in future he proposes to trust only land. He is a wise man. Rhodesia as a land for the agriculturalist may have a chance; as a mining district it appears to me in the hands of the mining expert.

MISCELLANEOUS shares are very dull, and the public does not gamble here to-day. The Cement venture, however, has run its course, and Cements should be unloaded. Omnibus shares, now that the competitor has been disposed of, may be attractive; but they are too heavy for the ordinary speculator, and the market is in the hands of one man who can really make the price what he likes.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CORRESPONDENCE

MR. BERNARD SHAW AT CAMBRIDGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a regrettable outburst (entitled a "Detestable Outrage") which occupies so prominent a position in your issue of June 3rd.

Although, in a vain endeavour to avoid the inevitable, reporters were expressly excluded from the ticket meeting on May 29th, when Mr. Bernard Shaw was invited by a Cambridge Society (including, by the way, amongst its members ten University Professors) to discourse to them on "The Future of Religion," yet the usual unscrupulous wrenching of a few judiciously-chosen phrases out of their context duly appeared in the halfpenny anti-Socialist Press the next morning. I am surprised, Sir, that THE ACADEMY should be so readily deceived by methods so familiar.

To show the extent of the misrepresentation, I ask would any one gather from your article that Mr. Shaw also spoke as a mystic—against the opponents of Religion—declaring his admiration for the share of Christ in working out the Ideal of God—and urging that we, as Incarnations of God, the Life-Force, must work for a nobler conception of Humanity? So much for materialism and coarse profanity.

As to kicking Mr. Shaw into the Cam, the official attitude of the University may be found in the Cambridge Review of June 1st. Mr. Shaw's brilliant and inspiring address was received with the greatest enthusiasm. (Though many must have disagreed, I question if any member of the large audienoe found Mr. Shaw . . . I refrain from reproducing language so atrocious.)

Sir, your article as it stands is an outrage on University intelligence, on our Society, on Mr. Bernard Shaw—who appeared the very incarnation of G. B. S.—and on yourself, who have based so violent an attack on a bit of obviously sensational journalism.

In conclusion, Sir, why drag in "Socialism"—naked and unashamed withal?—Believe me, yours, &c.,

C. K. OGDEN (President, "The Heretics.")

Magdalene College, Cambridge, June 6th, 1911.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I take it from Mr. Cecil Cowper's second paragraph of what purports to be a criticism of Mr. Shaw's lecture recently delivered at Cambridge that he was not present on that occasion; in spite of which he has the superb insolence to describe that lecture as "a detestable outrage." Surely any journalist, however young and inexperienced, with an atom of self-respect, would hesitate even to form a judgment of a lecture from newspaper reports, particularly on a subject which he considers of vital importance. Mr. Cowper is kind enough to tell us that it is profoundly indifferent to him whether Mr. Shaw has beliefs or has none. Why then does he waste his time in an attempt to confute what he imagines to be Mr. Shaw's opinions? I shall show in the course of this letter that paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of Mr. Cowper's article bear no relation to what Mr. Shaw said, therefore on the present occasion it is superfluous to attempt any answer to them.

The concluding paragraph is really quite comic in its patronising scorn for those who happen to hold different opinions from Mr. Cowper. To his own complete satisfaction he has demonstrated that Mr. Shaw has no understanding or capacity to understand Christianity; he then assumes that on the subject of Socialism Mr. Shaw is infallible. He next succinctly describes men like Charles Kingsley, Frederick Denison Maurice (who has probably influenced theological teachers more than any man in the nineteenth century) and other prominent divines now living as "certain persons of confused intelligence [who] have described themselves as Christian Socialists." Whether or no the founder of Christianity was a failure surely has no effect upon the value or validity of this teaching. Let Mr. Cowper consider for a minute the lives of most of the great teachers and artists. I would ask Mr. Cowper to remember that it was the upholders of the orthodox religion in His day who crucified Christ, and that Christ condemned in bitter and scathing words those who put belief before conduct.

But enough of Mr. Cowper. It will surely be more interesting and more important to the readers of THE ACADEMY to know what Mr. Shaw said on the occasion in question.

The Guardian (June 2nd, 1911, p. 750), a paper of unimpeachable Christian orthodoxy, writes as follows:—"The Heretics had an open meeting on Monday afternoon, when Mr. Bernard Shaw spoke on the Future of Religion. It is significant that the lecturer obviously had the sympathy of his audience, which consisted of about 250, mostly undergraduates. If he criticised mercilessly the popular religious beliefs of to-day, he also upheld strongly the necessity of having a religion. It may be added that the Union debate on the preceding Tuesday decided by a small majority 'that this House welcomes the influence of Mr. Bernard Shaw upon the thought of the country.'"

Mr. Shaw certainly showed, and himself stated, that he had no reverence, and added that sincere belief was seldom accompanied with reverence. He was full of humour, and often blasphemous, but there was always a serious meaning not far below. Some experience of theological teachers, from intellectual Roman priests to the most unlettered of village preachers, certainly bears out Mr. Shaw's contention: If we want reverence we must be content with the great agnostics and sceptics, and ignore those who hold any belief with fervour and passion—whether they be Theist or Atheist, Christian or Buddhist. To my mind, Mr. Shaw's pose of flippancy was often perverse and needlessly offensive. But the "pose of flippancy" is not confined to Irishmen like Mr. Shaw. It was only the other day, in a private correspondence with a very distinguished theologian prominent not only in Cambridge but throughout England, I expressed my own feeling and that of many others by saying that he seemed "incurably flippant," but as he answered me with complete courtesy, I will say no more on that point; I merely quote this as an illustration of how serious and sincere belief is often accompanied with something quite different. Mr. Shaw is certainly not a Christian; he was merciless, emotional, and, I venture to think, quite illogical, in his attacks on Christ and Christianity. He spent the early part of his lecture in demolishing the orthodox conceptions (or what he held to be the orthodox conceptions) of God; but half-way through "he also upheld strongly the necessity of having a religion," the absolute unthinkableness of a merely material world without God, and the necessity of living a righteous life. He asserted with deep solemnity that no man can fight against God without a crushing defeat; that we were merely the instruments of God created by Him to work His will. Most people in the audience, whether or no they agreed with Mr. Shaw, recognised his intense seriousness, and felt some of the inspiration that contact with a fearless sincerity must always bring. This feeling made some regret still more certain things that were said.

"Christ was a failure." Any devout or sincere believer in Christ who cares at all for Christian ideals, if he looks around him, even if he confines his gaze merely to the villages and towns of England, must see a meaning in that phrase; if he be a humble man, he will feel that failure is largely his own fault; and if he be as well a brave man, he will do his best to turn that failure into a triumphant success.

I have written at too great length, but there are few more things I want to say. It seems to me the obvious duty of the upholders of Christianity to attempt an argued and emotional reply to Mr. Shaw; and I am absolutely confident that any man who attempts such a reply will have a much larger and more demonstratively enthusiastic audience of "young persons who are placed here (Cambridge) for educative purposes" than that which listened to Mr. Shaw on May 29th, 1911.

In Cambridge just now there is no lack of interest in religion, as can be seen from the vigorous and aggressive enthusiasm of the Heretics, the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union—to mention only two of many such societies—and the large numbers (mostly not professional students of theology) who attended the recent lectures given by Dr. Rashdall, Dr. Sanday, the Bishop of Birmingham, and Dr. Inge.

AUSTIN H. JOHNSON.

GEORGE BORROW

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The two interesting articles on the puzzling personality of George Borrow which have recently appeared in THE ACADEMY tempt me to supplement some of the writer's comments and conclusions with a few recollections and comments of my own which may serve to make clear certain points that have mystified more than one student of the works of him who was once called "The Wandering Jew of Literature."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

With Borrow, both as writer and man, the love of mystifying others was in danger of passing into a monomania. It was a real joy to him to puzzle his fellow-men, to set men wondering and talking about him and his works, and the more they wondered and talked the more he chuckled and chortled in his self-elected isolation. The story, or rather the episode, of Isopel Berners to some extent, in my belief, was deliberately planned to tease the reader. Here was a distinctly fascinating figure laying hold of the imagination in a quite unusual way, placed in an anomalous position in relation to the hero and the onlookers, and yet in the end left in the infinite, with not a word of explanation as to whither she had gone, or what was or would be her fate.

The origin, to my thinking, of this singular and unforgettable situation is probably threefold, and to be traced to a stubborn tenet, an accentuation of personality, and a known or unknown influence. In the first place, I remember so well Borrow, on a visit to us at Rockhampton, taking up a modern book—an indeed rare event with him, for he never deigned to read his contemporaries—and, after scrutinising it carefully, throwing it down with the words—"These modern fellows never know when to stop! The great art of writing is to know when to stop!" I was then reading "Lavengro" for the first time, and the remark carried with it an illuminating significance to my youthful mind. The criticism was a kind of Open Sesame to the mystery of Isopel Berners. Again, with Borrow it was almost a religion to appear to be unlike others, both as author and as man; and to have told the world all about the love, marriage, maternity, and death of his heroine would have been to class himself with the rank and file of fictionists and biographers. Perhaps one of the most remarkable and anomalous episodes of the slighter order in literature is that of Ann in De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium-Eater," one of the most clinging incidents one can recall: Ann waiting at the corner of Berners Street, by firm appointment, as the commercials say, and yet, by the wild accident of fate, never to meet her devoted lover again. One might well wonder whether Borrow had this touching incident in mind, consciously or unconsciously, when he let Isopel come into and vanish from the reader's ken. The name with which he endowed his heroine is certainly suggestive of such a possibility.

The tantalising methods of the two writers in any case carry with them an enduring advantage. To have left these two women in the infinite is to have bequeathed them to us as imperishable phantoms haunting the shores of old romance. Like the unrequited love they seem to symbolise, they are without beginning and without end. Isopel is still waving her farewell to the mystic Lavengro. Ann is still at the corner of the street awaiting her inconsolable lover.

That the story of "Lavengro" is largely autobiographical, or at least personal, few who had the privilege of knowing Borrow could doubt, but it was the memoir of a man who transformed all he saw, including his own image in the magnifying mirror of his soul, into poetry and romance.

He was essentially one of the many victims of the maladie du siècle inaugurated by Goethe in his "Sorrows of Werther," and by Byron in his "Childe Harold" and "Manfred," and perpetuated by Alfred de Musset and the rest. The singular story of the old man who was too idle in youth to learn to tell the time, yet who had been at infinite pains to learn Chinese through the medium of figures painted on tea-pots and tea-chests in order to avert "the horrors," is typical of Borrow's bewildered attitude towards the world's formalisms and Nature's mysteries of birth, life, and death.

The episode setting forth with wondrous realism the case of the recluse who had ostracised himself from the world and all its activities and ambitions because of the "touching mania" which in his delusion he imagined would avert the evil chance, is again as personal to the author as anything in the book.

I am, Sir, &c.,

A. Egmont Hake.

"CONTEMPORARY BELGIAN POETRY"

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—I see from your issue of June 3rd that you devote a not ungenerous space to a review by "R. M." of this latest addition to the 1s. "Canterbury Poets" Series. But why be so fearful for "the young"? And why say "if this book had been the original work of an English poet it would never have found a publisher"? It most certainly would so long as I remain in the editorial charge here.

Permit me to point out that when arranging for and accepting this book Professor Jethro Bithell was perfectly aware of my intentions towards the MS. I did all I could for poor old Mrs. Grundy, going so far even as to mutilate masterpieces by Belgian poets, and in some instances—much against my will—to destroy whole poems in order that the little class of people who see sin in a surplice—your reviewer's "Robert Buchanan and his blushing comrades," for instance—should not have their delicate sensibilities disturbed. I pause to try and imagine "R. M.'s" feelings when he meets with our next offspring—viz., "Contemporary French Poetry" by the same author.

When will it be permitted to all art work to work its mission undisturbed, without being periodically held up as corrupt and corrupting because some old grandmother (who would cover up the statuary in the British Museum) must linger over the type-letters—unable to catch the intent, spirit, and mission of the master-mind who can paint only what he sees? Surely this is the twentieth century!—Your obedient servant,

Frederick J. Crowest, Editor and General Manager.
(For the Walter Scott Publishing Company, Ltd.)
Felling-on-Tyne.

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—Will you allow me a few words to rectify an error in the review of my Anthology of Belgian Poetry? The reviewer says that I have published my translations "without expurgation." This is unfortunately not the case. I would not myself expurgate a line; but the translations have been published not by me, but by the Walter Scott Publishing Co., and they considered themselves bound to make some concessions to Mrs. Grundy. Surely your reviewer should have understood that a line of dots indicates an omission? One long poem of Albert Mockel stops short half way; the terribly brutal ending of Verhaeren's "The Peasants" is wanting; and there are other evident mutilations.

I agree with your reviewer that it would be sensible and courageous to publish translations of vigorous poetry without expurgation; but what English publisher will have the sense and the courage to do it? As "M. R." says, "Flemish art is outspoken." English art is not outspoken—i.e., it is hypocritical.—Yours faithfully,

J. Bithell.

15, Winscombe-crescent, Brentham, Ealing, W.,
June 3rd, 1911.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS

Argentine Plains and Andine Glaciers: Life on an Estancia, and an Expedition into the Andes. By Walter Larden, M.A. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 14s. net.

Light and Twilight. By Edward Thomas. Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Tours in Norway. Illustrated. F. Beyer's Tourist Bureau, Christiania. Gratis.

The Alien Problem and its Remedy. By M. J. Landa. P. S. King and Son. 5s. net.

A Holiday in South Africa. By the Right Hon. Sir H. Mortimer Durand, G.C.M.G. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.

Gothic Architecture in England and France. By G. H. West, D.D. Illustrated. G. Bell and Sons. 6s. net.

Patriotism: a Biological Study. By H. G. F. Spurrell, M.A. G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

Through the Alps to the Apennines. By P. G. Konody. Illustrated by E. A. Rickards and Robert Little, R.W.S. Kegan Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.

The Philosophy of a Don. By G. F. Abbot. Stephen Swift. 5s. net.

Regimen Sanitatis, the Rule of Health. A Gaelic Medical Manuscript of the Early Sixteenth Century, or perhaps Older, from the Vade Mecum of the Famous Macbeaths. By H. Cameron Gillies, M.D. Robert MacLehose and Co., Glasgow.

Tourist Guide to the Continent. (With Travel-Talk in German, French, and English.) Edited by Percy Lindley. Illustrated and with Maps. Continental Department, G.E.R. 6d.

The Man in the Street. Essays by W. Stanley Scott. Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

The Philosophy of Bergson. By A. D. Lindsay. J. M. Dent and Sons. 5s. net.

Nationalities and Subject Races: Report of Conference held in Caxton Hall, Westminster, June 28-30, 1910. P. S. King and Son. 3s. 6d. net.

A Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales. By Jonathan Nield. Elkin Mathews. 8s. net.

Juvenile Labour Exchanges and After-Care. By Arthur Greenwood. With an Introduction by Sidney Webb, LL.B. P. S. King and Son. 1s. net.

The West in the East from an American Point of View. By Price Collier. Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Dickens and Thackeray Studied in Three Novels. By the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

The Apostle. A Drama in Three Acts. By George Moore. Maunsel and Co., Dublin.

The Charm of Copenhagen. By Ethel C. Hargrove. Illustrated. Methuen and Co. 6s.

Medical Revolution: A Plea for National Preservation of Health based upon the Natural Interpretation of Disease. By Sydney W. MacIlwaine, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. (Retired). P. S. King and Son. 2s. 6d. net.

Life and Death. By A. Dastre, Professor of Physiology at the Sorbonne. Translated by W. J. Greenstreet, M.A., F.R.A.S. The Walter Scott Publishing Co. 5s.

Triumphant Vulgarity. By Charles J. Whitby. Frontispiece. Stephen Swift. 3s. 6d. net.

The Economic Transition in India. By Sir Theodore Morison, K.C.I.E. John Murray. 5s. net.

Prophesyings and Spirit-Rappings. By S. Henry. The Leominster Printing Co. 1s.

Significs and Language. The Articulate Form of our Expressive and Interpretative Resources. By V. Welby. Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

Problems of Life. By the Rev. C. A. Houghton, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 3s. net.

Letters from India. By Lady Wilson. William Blackwood and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.

VERSE

Idyllia. By the Author of "Thysia." G. Bell and Sons. 1s. net.

The Silver Age. A Dramatic Poem by Arthur E. J. Legge. John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.

Snowdrops and Daffodils. By D. J. Parry-Crooke. Hammond, Hammond, and Co. 1s. net.

Songs of the Birds. By Ida Norman. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Sonnets. By "Lucilla." Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.

Rex et Imperator. Ode on the Coronation of Their Most Gracious Majesties King George V. and Queen Mary. By J. H. E. While. Illustrated by E. Morton and H. F. Newey. Siegle Hill and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Po(e)t Pourri. By John Penstowe. Century Press. 3s. 6d.

The New Hesperides, and Other Poems. By Joel Elias Springarn. Sturgis and Walton Co., New York. $1.

Through Dust to Light. Poems from an Apprenticeship. By Robert Valantine Heckscher. Sherman, French, and Co., Boston, U.S.A. $1 net.

The Green Fields. By Kenneth Hare. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

The House of Life. Interpretations of the Symbolical Pictures of the late G. F. Watts by Harrold Johnson. Illustrated. J. M. Dent and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

The Garden Sundial, and Ovingdean. By Alfred H. Cashmore. Reigate Press, Reigate.

Bell and Wing. By F. Fanning Ayer. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 10s. 6d. net.

Cornwall, the English Riviera. A Poem by P. J. Kislingbury. J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 2s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Herkomers. By Sir Hubert von Herkomer, C.V.O. Vol. II. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Metternich. By G. A. C. Sandeman. Illustrated. Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

The Diary of Dr. John William Polidori, 1816. Relating to Byron, Shelley, &c. Edited and Elucidated by Wm. Michael Rossetti. Elkin Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.

The Mystic Bride: A Study of the Life-story of Catherine of Siena. By Mrs. Aubrey Richardson. Illustrated. T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England: An Historical Survey. By James Gairdner, C.B. Vol. III. Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

Thirty-four Years in Poona City: Being the History of the Panch Howds Poona City Mission, India. By the Rev. Father Elwin, S.S.J.E. Illustrated. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.

Recollections of a Parisian (Docteur Poumiès de la Siboutie), under Six Sovereigns, Two Revolutions, and a Republic (1789-1863). Edited by his Daughters, Mesdames A. Branche and L. Dagoury. Translated from the French by Lady Theodora Davidson. John Murray. 10s. 6d. net.

Two Centuries of the English Novel. By Harold Williams, M.A. Smith, Elder and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

The Autobiography of Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate, 1835-1910. 2 Vols. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 24s. net.

The United Irishwomen. Their Place, Work, and Ideals. By Horace Plunkett, Ellice Pilkington, and George Russell ("Æ"). With a Preface by the Rev. T. A. Finlay. Maunsel and Co., Dublin. 6d. net.

Uruguay Past and Present. By W. H. Koebel. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

The Great Solemnity of the Coronation of a King and Queen according to the Use of the Church of England. With Notes and Excursuses, Liturgical, Historical, and Descriptive. By Douglas Macleane, M.A. With an Introduction by the Lord Bishop of Salisbury. George Allen and Co. 5s. net.

Saint Athanasius. By Rev. Henry Ranken, B.D. J. Gardner Hitt, Edinburgh. 1s. net.

The Form and Order of the Coronation Service, with the Music to be Sung. Edited by Sir Frederick Bridge, M.V.O. Novello and Co.

EDUCATIONAL

A Short History of English Versification from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. A Handbook for Teachers and Students. By Max Kaluza, Ph.D. Translated by A. C. Dunstan, Ph.D. George Allen and Co. 5s. net.

The Training of the Memory in Art, and the Education of the Artist. By Lecoq de Boisbaudran. Translated from the French by L. D. Luard. With an Introduction by Selwyn Image, M.A.

FICTION

A Woman of Small Account. (A South African Social Picture.) By Mary E. Martens. Walter Scott Publishing Co. 6s.

The Soul of the Moor. A Romance of the Occult. By Stratford D. Jolly. Illustrated. W. Rider and Son. 2s. net.

The Legacy: A Story of a Woman. By Mary S. Watts. Macmillan and Co. 6s.

PERIODICALS

Blackwood's Magazine; The Antiquary; Educational Times; The Conservator; Cambridge University Reporter; The Vineyard; The English Review; Empire Review; Book Monthly; School World; Bookseller; London University Gazette; The Author; Ulula; Peru To-Day; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Mercure de France; Deutsche Rundschau; Publishers' Circular; The Wednesday Review; La Revue; Revue Bleue; The International; The Southern Sphere; The Papyrus; The Bibelot; The Dawn of Day; Golden Sunbeams; The Sketch, Coronation Number.

FIVE LECTURES
by
MRS. ANNIE BESANT
(President of the Theosophical Society),
QUEEN'S HALL, LANGHAM PLACE, W.
(Sole Lessees—Messrs. Chappell & Co., Ltd.).
SUBJECT:
THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE.
On Sunday Evenings:
June 11. Impending Physical Changes.
" 18. The Growth of a World-Religion.
" 25. The Coming of a World-Teacher.
July 2. Social Problems: Self-Sacrifice or Revolution?
" 9. Religious Problems: Dogmatism or Mysticism?
At 7 p.m. promptly.
Seats—Numbered and Reserved, 5s., 3s., 2s. Admission 1s. and 6d., and Free.
Apply to the Theosophical Publishing Society, 161, New Bond Street, London, W.; or the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, W.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During July & August.	Southampton, Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY
OF THE

THE ACADEMY
AND LITERATURE

No. 2041 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JUNE 17, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

Works: TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Offices: 20, CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, W.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

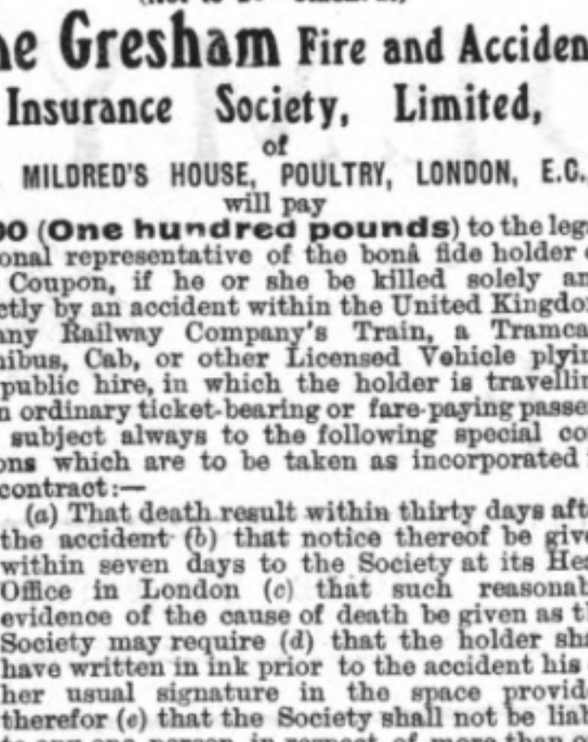
Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest Referenees. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)



The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

THE PERMANENT BLUE-BLACK INK.

The best Writing Ink for modern office use
Ask your Stationer for it.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT

INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE. POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

Catalogue No. 378.

JUNE SUPPLEMENT TO GLAISHER'S CATALOGUE
Of Popular and Attractive Books
at Cheap Remainder Prices.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON,
(and at 14, George Street, Croydon).
The books are on view at both addresses.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Bookfinder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

THE PROGRESS BOOK: an Illustrated Register of the Development of a Child from Birth until Coming of Age. By J. J. PILLEY, Ph.D.—London: The Leadenhall Press, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. One Shilling and Sixpence.

THE JUNE

BOOK MONTHLY

is a Good Number for the Coronation and it costs 6d.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Talk of a Literary Sort which you may Pass Round the Coronation Dinner-table.

GENTLEMEN! THE LADIES! What Every Woman Likes in the Novels she Reads.—By Amy Croft.

WHAT THE CITY MAN READS. A Passing Study in Newspapers, Books and Mixed Human Nature.—By George Sampson.

A SONG OF THE SHIRT. On the Note "Why dont Working Women Read More?"—By Priscilla E. Moulder.

THE WILL AND THE WAY. Strange Things about the Last Testaments of Notable Authors.—By W. Bailey Kempling.

A LONDON LETTER. A Salt Sea Voyage and some Bookish Discoveries.—By the Editor.

COPYRIGHT—AND WRONG. New Laws in the Making and a Dispatch from Canada.

CORONATION JUNE. Novels to be Read while you Wait for the Royal Show.—By C. E. Lawrence.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of May, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some June Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,
Stationer's Hall Court, London.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	735
Summer Underground	736
Jupiter Tonans	736
Medical Practice and the State Insurance Bill	736
Morocco-Bound	739
Reviews:—
Five Modern Thinkers	740
Mother and Son	741
Tabloid Wisdom	742
The Art of Rejuvenation	743
Fiction	744
The Theatre	745
The Shakespeare Festival at His Majesty's	748
Mrs. Besant at the Queen's Hall	748
Indian and Colonial Reviews, etc.	749
A Japanese on Whistler	750
Some Old Theatres of Paris—I.	750
The Limit	751
The Story of a Book—II.	753
A New Zealand Sheep-drive	754
The Magazines	755
Art	756
Imperial & Foreign Affairs	757
The Church Army and Boy Emigrants	759
Beautiful Varenna	760
In the Temple of Mammon	760
Correspondence	761
Books Received	763

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

WE observe that Mr. Bernard Shaw, speaking at a meeting of the Smoke Abatement Society, is reported to have said that ever since volition in the matter has rested with him his ablutions have never exceeded the area of his face and hands. It is amusing to observe that Mr. Shaw is stealing the clothes which he says introduced Sir Almroth Wright to fame. It is also rather amusing to note that, although Mr. Shaw disdains to wash himself like an ordinary mortal, he found an occasion of whitewashing himself to cover up some of the utterances attributed to him in his recent lecture at Cambridge.

Some results of the sale of the Huth collection of autographs at Messrs. Sotheby's on Monday last are of great interest not only to connoisseurs, but to students of psychology. Two extremely brief documents written by Henry Fielding brought in the open mart the enormous sum of £1,015, one being the agreement by which he bound himself to write "a certain book printed in six volumes known and called by the name and title of 'The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling,'" the other a receipt for "six hundred pounds being in full for the sole Copy Right" of the same work. Why should these faded, fragile scraps of paper signify so much in modern money? So much, that is, entirely apart from any question of such investments as a financial speculation: for not every one buys to sell again. Into glass cases, to be looked at, rarely handled, they will go; the owner's literary friends will admire and envy, his unliterary friends will admire and scoff; and he will be happy at the addition to his collection. From the mystical human point of view the handwriting of the meanest labourer who lived and died a hundred or two hundred years ago is as fascinating as the autograph of a Shakespeare—what were his thoughts, who were his companions, what meant his life to himself and them? But because Dryden and Defoe wrote pages that we can still read, because Fielding and Goldsmith can still thrill us, we feel a kind of kinship when we see their actual writing; we grasp hands across the lapse of time with some one we have known almost as a friend. Perhaps this is the explanation. Let the psychologist take up the story.

Barricades to prevent good citizens from approaching too close to their monarchs are not rare in the capitals of the Continent, and they have often played an important rôle in the prevention or consummation of revolutions, but it remains for Mr. Winston Churchill to introduce them into the streets of London. The most democratic Government of the century has so low an opinion of its supporters that it is doing all in its power to prevent them exercising their legitimate freedom of movement on Coronation Day. Perhaps Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill think that after the wild denunciations of the electioneering platform during the past two years it would not be good for their cause for too many of the hungry and oppressed to look on their monarch and their oppressors in the flesh. The spectacle might be too much for them: they might show, in the words of Macaulay—

> Lest when our latest hope is fled,
> Ye taste of our despair,
> And learn by proof in some wild hour,
> How much the wretched dare.

We maintain that these barricades closing the side streets to the main route of the procession are a gross interference with the rights and liberties of citizens, and are also a grave source of danger to the public. They have never been considered necessary in the past, so why should they be required on the present occasion? Simply because the Home Secretary must try and keep his fading name before the public by some reckless innovation. The Battle of Sydney-street was the precursor of the barricades round Piccadilly. It only remains to have them loopholed and a detachment of the Guards to provide picked marksmen to shoot down those who press too hard. What is likely to happen on the day of the procession? Each gate is to be closed at the discretion of a police officer, who will give the order when he considers that portion of the route in his immediate neighbourhood is sufficiently full. But other parts may be comparatively empty, and the crowd, if left to its own devices, would automatically spread itself over the whole, like water finding its proper level. It will be almost impossible to close the gates, and the pressure round the barricades of the crowd trying to get through or being pushed back will most certainly lead to many being crushed to death. Such are the methods of Democracy as administered by an Anglo-American.

Is the spirit of England so dead that no one will take the matter into his own hands? Are there no citizens left with a love of liberty, and the possessors of a few sharp axes? Down with the barricades we say, and let us have the troops to keep the route as of yore! Every citizen has a right to see his King on Coronation Day without the permission of Mr. Winston Churchill. "Oh, liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!"

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SUMMER UNDERGROUND

A boy came into the Tube with roses,
  Roses, roses, fragrant and red;
  We were many and we were dead,
Half asleep, as a dead man dozes,
  Earth at his feet and earth at his head.
But a boy come into the Tube with roses,
  Crimson roses, dewy with rain.
He was ragged and round and smiling,
He looked up with an air beguiling,
  "Will ye buy roses?"—Oh, we were fain—
They were fragrant, fragrant and red.
  Then we waked, we were living again,
We came suddenly back from the dead,
For a boy came into the Tube with roses,
  Crimson roses, dewy with rain.

ETHEL TALBOT.

JUPITER TONANS

WE have carefully refrained from commenting on the superior attitude adopted by the Spectator towards the inferior journalistic species. Impunity has, however, led to an attitude which exhibits the first example of humour observed in that highly respectable review under its present editorship.

The attack on the English Review in last week's issue, although not intended to be comic, is intensely funny. The wrath is Olympian; the abnegation—thoroughly illogical as it is—positively sublime. Patronage or filthy lucre? We will none of them, says the Spectator:—

> Our only course, then, until some change takes place, is to refuse to notice the magazine or to accept its advertisements.

The concluding words are, we think, imprudent. Virtue may be its own reward, but it is difficult to run a newspaper with financial success on an asset which is not negotiable. Not only that; the labourer is worthy of his hire, the newspaper of its advertisement rates.

The Spectator, however, in its contempt for paltry mundane considerations, has given the English Review an advertisement which that Review would gladly have drawn a large cheque to receive. If the temperature of the mercury lately be left out of account, what is all the fuming and fussing about?

The English Review for June has published an article from the pen of Mr. Frank Harris, which we should like to say, with all humility, we think is less brilliant than most of the compositions of that accomplished writer. The editor of the Spectator is well qualified to ask us whether there is not a second count in his indictment. We say at once that there is.

The English Review, unlike a famous General, does not despise advertisement:—

> An advertisement pamphlet of the English Review has lately been sent broadcast through the post headed "The Great Adult Review," followed by the query "Why Adult?"

The answer to the question is in effect that the English Review does not intend to be an organ virginibus puerisque.

It is surely within the competence of the proprietor and editor to choose their own public. Their Review is not one which boys and girls with limited pocket-money would be likely to purchase, because its cost is half-a-crown. Neither do we think that, able as its contributions are, they would attract boys and girls in the smallest degree. Penny journals with the usual features appeal to the boy and girl reader.

We hold no brief for the English Review, but we think that if the "garbage"—if it be "garbage"—which appears in its columns were not advertised by reproduction in a much less expensive periodical it follows that a lesser quantity would be "dumped on the nation's doorstep."

Journalistic amenities should surely be observed, and to refer to the English Review as indulging in the "'leering,' 'knowing' cant purveyed by the catalogue-compilers of shady second-hand booksellers, when, under the plea of honesty and plain speaking, they recommend some particularly nauseous work," is altogether to exceed the limits not only of judicious, but of pardonable criticism.

We forbear to quote the language employed on page 876 of the Spectator, lines 24 to 27, because, although Mr. Frank Harris, in a passage set out above, has been guilty of somewhat confused expression, and has shadowed forth what might—in his opinion—be excusable or permissible in an actuality which does not and cannot exist, he has at least used a literary touch which we do not observe in the criticism which we have declined to quote. It was only in our last issue that we had occasion to offer some considered remarks on the cognate subject of "expurgation." We wrote:—

> All difficulty would be at an end if the volumes containing such passages fell only into the hands of critics; but when, in the nature of things, a book is sold to whomsoever chooses to buy it, "concessions to Mrs. Grundy" seem inevitable. The danger is that in our revolt from the "prunes and prisms" of early and mid-Victorian days we swing the pendulum too far in the opposite direction. It is no easy task to hold the balance true between the hide-bound propriety, the comfortable "properness" of the past, and that degree of outspokenness which shall result in good both to Art and to those whom it influences.

It is that duty and that task which THE ACADEMY will endeavour to realise. We cannot promise that with the utmost circumspection we shall always succeed. One promise, however, we can make to our readers: in the region of criticism we shall not imitate the literary gems to be found in the last issue of the Spectator.

CECIL COWPER.

MEDICAL PRACTICE AND THE STATE INSURANCE BILL

THE following article is the first of a series which will deal with the National Insurance Scheme proposed by the Government. This scheme is one of great importance, both socially and politically. It marks a departure from the old principle of laissez faire as great as that which was made when old-age pensions were granted. Every class in the country will be affected by the measure if it is carried into law. There is a general consensus that Mr. Lloyd George's plan contains much which is excellent, but it is also generally agreed that it offers a wide scope for salutary criticism. In the series of articles now begun it is intended to deal with the position of women under the scheme, and the position of employers, friendly societies, insurance companies and insurance agents, trade unions, and the other classes mainly concerned. The probable effect of the scheme upon thrift in relation to the national character will also be discussed, together with some kindred subjects. The series is edited by Sir William Bull, M.P., who will contribute an article on the class of Post-office contributors which is to be formed under the operation of the Bill.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

The position of the medical practitioner under the Bill as it stands at present is a thoroughly unsatisfactory one, and this is largely due to the assumption by the Chancellor of a condition of affairs in medical practice that does not exist. Mr. Lloyd George (if one may judge from the published reports of his speeches) seems to be under the impression that the majority of the medical practice in the kingdom among the working classes is of the kind generally known as club or contract practice. This is far from being a correct statement of the case. It may be freely admitted that there is a great deal of contract practice among the working classes, but this by no means forms the main source of income of the general practitioner; and while a large percentage of the artisan class belong to one or another of the benefit societies or share-out clubs, the proportion that avail themselves, in London at any rate, of the medical benefit is comparatively small. Any medical man practising in an artisan district will agree that the larger portion of his income is derived from private patients whose wages vary from 30s. a week upwards. Under this Bill I have no hesitation in affirming, from my personal knowledge of many general practices, that from 30 per cent. to 70 per cent. of such private practices—the percentage naturally varying with the district—would be automatically converted into club practices, and it will require a far more cogent argument than the honeyed assurances of the Chancellor to persuade the general practitioner that this will be to his advantage.

Were it a fact, as seems to be assumed, that the great majority of the working classes are at present receiving medical attendance at contract rates, any scheme that would raise the contract fee, which at present only really represents charity very thinly disguised, would be welcomed by the profession; but, as a correct knowledge of the actual state of affairs by no means bears out this assumption, the effect of the Bill would be to diminish, both as regards capital and income, the financial value of every general practice in the country without the slightest attempt at compensation being even suggested.

Experience, a far more valuable teacher than imagination based on inaccurate premises, has shown the general practitioner that the majority of wage-earners receiving £2 a week and upward are not in the habit of availing themselves of the medical benefits of their clubs. They prefer a free and unfettered choice of their medical man, and are both able and willing to pay a fee commensurate with their financial position; and the bad debts that Mr. Lloyd George assures us we shall be free from in the future are not, as a rule, contracted among this class of patient. Naturally there always have been and always will be those who take advantage of any and every opportunity of obtaining medical attendance at the cheapest possible rate, and it is a known fact that people of this class who are able but unwilling to pay the usual medical fees prevailing in their district are always a source of trouble to the unfortunate medical man who has them on his club-list. They ignore the rules of the club so far as they relate to the conditions of medical attendance, and in fact demand to be treated as private patients while only paying club fees. To give an example, which is characteristic if trivial, I know a case where one of this class reported his doctor to the club secretary because the practitioner told him that the fees paid by the club for medical attendance did not include the supply by the doctor of a fresh bottle every time more medicine was required. Can it be wondered that with cases like this arising every day medical men decline positively to undertake contract work for the State under the control of friendly societies?

The club secretary knows that nine out of ten of the complaints made against the club doctor are unwarranted and unfounded, but he is bound, under fear of losing his own berth, to bring them forward. The Committee, composed entirely of working men, is as a rule only too glad of an opportunity to support one of their own class, and the result is that, unless the doctor is a strong man and financially independent of his club appointment, his subsequent attendance before the Committee is not likely either to increase his self-respect or engender any marked feeling of friendliness toward his employers.

The Chancellor is reported to have stated that he cannot interfere with the clause of his Bill that gives the control of the doctors attending Friendly Society contributors into the hands of the Friendly Society Committees, on the ground that there are a number of vested interests involved, such as practices that have been bought with a transfer of the club appointment to the purchaser. Is it possible that he is ignorant of the fact that there are also practices that have been bought and partnerships that have been entered into, without club appointments, which under the proposed Act would be rendered valueless, the capital invested in them being irretrievably lost? Is he ignorant of the fact that the mere proposal of this Bill has already converted a general practice in an artisan district from an asset worth at least one year's purchase on the gross takings into an absolutely unsaleable interest? Does he not realise that the "death vacancy" value of his practice, about six to nine months' purchase, was part of every medical man's insurance, and is now valueless; and that it must in the case of those who have dependents be replaced by taking out increased life policies, in the case of the elder members of the profession at a very heavy cost? There are hundreds of practices without any club appointments attached to them, the great majority of whose clients belong to the class which under the Act would have every inducement to join a Friendly Society. Is no consideration to be shown to the medical men who own such practices? It is not respect for the vested interests of the medical man that prompts the Chancellor to doubt whether the "control of the doctors can be transferred from the Friendly Societies." It seems to me that fear of the Friendly Societies and anxiety as to the destination of the votes they control causes this delicacy and doubt.

There is no reason why the administration of the medical benefits should not be transferred to the Local Health Committees entirely apart from the insurance part of the Bill, and those persons who are entitled to medical benefit under the Act should be able to select their own medical man from a list of those in their district who are willing to accept contract work. Under the present conditions, subscription to the medical benefits of the Friendly Societies being mostly optional, separate accounts have to be kept, and these could just as easily be kept by the Health Committee for the whole district. Then every medical man in the district holding a club appointment would surrender it, and, if he wished, could register his name as being willing to take contract practice under the Health Committee's management. I am confident that he would not lose 1 per cent. of his old club patients who were eligible for medical benefits under the new scheme, and the medical man who held no club appointment would be able to retain those of his former private patients whose wages were within the limit entitling them to medical benefits, as contract patients also under the control of the Health Committees. Unless some scheme of this sort is adopted the medical men who have no Friendly Society appointment—and they outnumber those who have by about ten to one—will find all their private patients whose earnings are below the wage-limit indicated in the Bill taken from them, and no opportunity given to them to retain these even as contract patients.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Under the plan here suggested the work would be centralised and the Health Committees would be able to keep a proper and just control both over the practitioners and the patients. There is in addition a large class which must be a source of considerable difficulty on the medical side of the scheme. Assuming that, as has been suggested above, the medical arrangements for the scheme are intrusted to the various Health Committees—and from the unanimously expressed opinion of medical men throughout the country it is practically certain that this will have to be so—it will still be impossible to adopt a fixed capitation fee to cover medical attendance on all entrants, even though the wage-limit for medical benefits be fixed at £2 a week. There are at present in every district hundreds of persons who either from chronic disease, intemperate or immoral habits, or simply from advancing years, will require an amount of medical attendance to keep them in health that no capitation fee which the Committees would have sufficient funds to grant would adequately remunerate. These persons are at present quite rightly debarred from entering the various clubs, as no society could stand the claims on its resources that they would cause, but they would practically all come in as Post-office contributors. To show what this would mean: A few years ago a certain Borough Council decided to form a sick club for its employees, and, in spite of the advice of a doctor whom they consulted in the matter, admitted all and sundry, old and young, healthy or sick, without any medical examination. At the end of the first year the Council had a deficit of over £150 to meet on that sick fund account, and it had to be met from the rates.

It seems to me that some system of classification from the health point of view will have to be made, and all those cases which will require an exceptional amount of medical attention will have to be grouped in a class by themselves, special provision being made for them either by a system of payment in proportion to work done or by the appointment of a salaried medical officer on some such lines as those now followed in the case of district medical officers under the Poor-law.

A great deal has been said and written with regard to the altruistic side of the medical profession; so much, in fact, that the lay public considers altruism in a doctor no longer a virtue, but an obligation. It may be a moral obligation personal to the individual practitioner, but that is quite another matter to compulsory altruism forced on a profession by Act of Parliament. When free education became general there was no question of an Act of Parliament to compel members of the teaching profession to disseminate their knowledge among the unlettered at an absolutely unremunerative rate on the plea that universal education was for the good of the country. And I cannot see the justice of the attempted exploitation of the medical profession under conditions which must mean financial loss to nearly all, and absolute ruin to not a few.

Another of the many points in which the unfairness of the Bill towards the medical profession is shown appears in section 13, par. 4, which reads:—

> Where . . . payment of sickness or disablement benefit is suspended on the ground that the disease or disablement has been caused by the misconduct of the person claiming the benefit such person shall nevertheless continue to be entitled to medical benefits.

Briefly summarised, this means that part of the punishment meted out by the State to the offender has to be borne by the doctor as if he were particeps criminis; although upon what ground of equity or justice he can be made a co-defendant with the offender is a riddle not solved by the Bill. It is a well-known fact that certain diseases caused by misconduct are difficult to cure, in some cases persisting for many years; and even under the present unsatisfactory conditions of contract practice the treatment of such diseases is not included in medical benefits.

There are many objections to the proposal to separate the giving of medical advice and the dispensing of medicines. Practically all medical men in general practice among the class that would be covered by this Bill dispense their own medicines, either personally or by means of a dispenser. It would be highly injudicious to allow the patient to keep his prescriptions, as he would be certain, sooner or later, to attempt self-treatment with them, and any system of prescription-books to be retained by the chemist and returned to the doctor would be impracticable. Very few medical men object to doing their own dispensing, and the suggestion put forward that they are in the habit of starving their drug account to the detriment of their club patients needs no refutation. The obvious foolishness of such a course is sufficient evidence of the groundlessness of the charge.

Another point in the Bill requiring attention is the absence of provision for fees for special work. I quote from a resolution passed by a body of general practitioners in a Metropolitan borough:—

> No system of remuneration will be satisfactory which does not, in addition to the ordinary scale fees for regular attendance, make provision for special remuneration in the cases of operations, night calls, treatment of fractures, dislocations, accidents under the Compensation Acts, and the administration of anæsthetics; also for the payment of reasonable fees where the assistance of a second practitioner is required in special emergencies.

Further, the scale and method of payment will not be settled without much difficulty. It is obvious that a system and scale of payment which would meet the views of a practitioner in London or a large provincial town, where the work would be contained within a certain area, would be quite unsatisfactory to a country practitioner with a clientèle dispersed over many miles of country. The suggestion that experiments should be tried in different districts is not practical, and could only lead to dissatisfaction and confusion. The medical practitioner is not inclined to make his livelihood the subject of such experiments.

In short, the Bill which was to provide an Elysian position for every medical man has been received by a profession notoriously long-suffering and unwilling to ventilate its grievances with a storm of disapproval, and there is among doctors an avowed determination to have nothing to do with the measure in its present form. The conditions which the British Medical Association, the representative body of the medical profession, has put forward as those under which the Government can command the co-operation of doctors in carrying out the medical portion of the scheme, are diametrically opposed to the provisions of the Bill, and one wonders from what source the compiler of the Bill obtained the idea that the scheme would be acceptable to the medical profession. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that, so far as the medical profession is concerned, the originator of the Bill's provisions had no knowledge whatever of the conditions of practice in this country, whether or no he was better informed in respect of Germany. Without information, and without the inquiries which it was obviously proper to make, he has attempted to force on the medical profession absolutely unacceptable conditions. Unless Mr. Lloyd George is prepared to withdraw these from his Bill and substitute such as can be approved by experienced practitioners, he will be met with non possumus on the part of the profession, and then for all practical purposes the medical side of the National Insurance Scheme will drop out of existence.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

M. Milton Townsend,
L.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. Edin., L.S.A. Lond.

MOROCCO-BOUND

By E. Ashmead-Bartlett

We remember some years ago seeing a very amusing and highly popular musical comedy entitled "Morocco-Bound," and it really appears that the piece might be revived with advantage at the present time, or else another written on the same lines. Morocco lends itself to humorous productions; the setting is perfect, and all the characters necessary for a successful musical comedy are found there in real life. However serious the situation may appear, it is always relieved at the critical moment by something irresistibly funny. The first Act opened a few weeks ago with Fez besieged, threatened with famine, and the forty odd Europeans in desperate straits. Lurid pictures were drawn in the French Press of tender women standing on the flat roofs of their houses, pressing their babes to their breast, gazing towards the South, and hoping against hope that the French troops would arrive in time. But, unfortunately, the Europeans in Fez knew so little of the rôle that was expected of them that their letters to the coast made no mention of their desperate plight. On the contrary, they expressly declared that food was not scarce, and that the half-hearted attacks of the tribesmen had been easily repulsed. However, this did not matter; the French had to keep up their end of the farce, and Bremond was despatched with a forlorn hope to relieve the capital and to save the women and children. Meanwhile the French Press regaled its readers with huge notices, "Will he arrive in time?" Bremond reached Fez without having to fire a shot, and then Monier and Brulard were despatched to relieve Bremond. The column started; soon it passed beyond the range of wireless telegraphy, and no news of it was received for several days. Only the reported rumble of guns showed how desperately it was having to fight its way through masses of the enemy, whom it was reported would die in defence of Fez rather than surrender it to the hated infidel.

The next Act opens with General Monier's arrival at Fez, with one man killed and six slightly wounded. The Sultan Moulai el Hafid receives him with unfeigned pleasure, and, playing his well-rehearsed part to perfection, begs him to remain and "never to leave no more." The French profess to be embarrassed, and solemnly declare this to be impossible, as they have no territorial ambitions and must abide by the Act of Algeciras, which is already so much waste paper. The comedy is then continued. Monier agrees thoroughly to chastise the rebels before he finally departs for home, a process which promises him a sufficiency of work for many years to come. He marches to Mekiness, and after a desperate resistance, in which the Moors are only driven from their positions by a bayonet charge, he finally enters the town. This time he has one man killed and fifteen wounded. Oh! you desperate Moors, how you fight! The honour of France demands that you should kill more Frenchmen than this! In the next scene a few Moors shoot up the French camp outside Fez, which justifies a further expedition against the Cherada tribe, who are supposed to be the offenders. The French artillery demolishes their villages and kasbahs, but the wily Cherada have already decamped, and no Frenchmen are hurt on this occasion. Meanwhile the women and children resolutely refuse to leave Fez and seek the shelter of the coast. They profess themselves perfectly happy in their old home, and are quite willing to take the risk of being spitted on bayonets or thrown to the lions. This of course is highly embarrassing to General Monier, who, well acquainted with his Act of Algeciras, knows that it is high time he returned to the coast. He remembers that less than four years before Baron Rosen had promised Abdul Aziz that the first French soldier who crossed the Algerian frontier would give the signal for the Germans to invade France. Poor Monier; what is he to do? Shall he stay at Fez and protect the women and children, or shall he hasten back to protect the French Frontier? He decides to remain, demands more troops, and prepares camps and depots.

Thus the play becomes very involved, and the fortunes of the various characters are somewhat difficult to follow. France wants Morocco; the women and children do not want protection, but France insists upon their having it. Moulai Hafid wants money and protection against his loyal subjects; Moulai Zin the Pretender wants to have Moulai Hafid's job; Germany wants a portion of Morocco, but cannot state her claim until France definitely announces her intention of remaining; and Sir Edward Grey does not want to be worried. Moulai Hafid thinks it would be a suitable occasion to send a deputation to the Coronation to congratulate King George; King George does not want the deputation as Moulai Hafid has not been behaving himself very well of late, having kidnapped all the beautiful ladies in the surrounding country and thrown many of his superfluous mothers-in-law to the lions, as, on account of the siege, sheep have been scarce. The Glawai, who has always been considered one of the greatest gentlemen in Morocco, and who possesses that patent of nobility, the personal friendship of Mr. Walter Harris, has also developed nasty traits of late. He has been summarily removed from his post of Grand Vizier for obtaining money by the extraction of undecayed teeth free of charge, and for cutting off the ears, noses, lips, hands, and feet, and gouging out the eyes of those who ventured to disagree with him on the local fiscal question. Raisuli, long quiescent, having "blown" the proceeds of his hospitality towards Sir Harry Maclean, legitimately complains that the present state of the country prohibits wealthy Europeans from travelling, and thus he has no opportunity to replenish his coffers. Surely, in the words of the old song, Morocco is "the most distressful country that ever yet was seen."

But we have not yet reached the end of this International Comedy; the pièce de résistance has been preserved to the end, and the real touch of humour is provided by the Spaniards. Now Spain makes no disguise of her territorial ambitions in Morocco. She is determined to share in the great partition, and of all the Powers she refuses to believe that France is acting purely disinterestedly in sending an army to Fez. The Spaniards remember Marshall MacMahon's famous dictum, Ici je suis, j'y reste. So our warlike little Spain determines to throw over all disguise, and to land troops herself at Laraiche, a little port some forty miles from Tangier. Laraiche is the natural point for any one to disembark who desires to go to Alcizar, twenty miles inland. Now Spain declares that she has landed her troops to protect her subjects in Alcizar, and the joke about this is that Alcizar has long since become an important base and depôt for Brulard and Monier's columns, which are at Fez. But, first of all, it was found necessary to have an excuse to intervene in contravention of the Act of Algeciras. This was found in the sad fate which befel a notorious blackleg called Hamid ben Malek and his two sons, who were Spanish protégés. In this connection it is as well to explain what a protégé is. He is a local Moor who, having committed some reprehensible and punishable act against his Sultan, can only escape the Imperial wrath by adopting the nationality of one of the foreign Powers, which immediately removes him from the jurisdiction of the local torturer and executioner to that of the Consular Court. He pays a small sum to the local Consul, and immediately becomes the citizen of his adopted country.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It happened that a new Rogi (Pretender) had sprung up in the hills around Alcizar, who captured Ben Malek, against whom he had some grievance. His two sons were decapitated before his eyes, and Ben Malek himself was promised his life if he would eat of the flesh of his murdered children. The fastidious Ben Malek refused, and was immediately decapitated in his turn, and the Rogi's followers decided the local football championship with his head as the ball. This gave Spain the necessary excuse to intervene, and 700 troops were landed at Lariche. This move on Spain's part has created a perfect furore of indignation in France. The French Press calls for reprisals for this gross violation of the Act of Algeciras. The French are, of course, furious that the Spaniards should have penetrated their plans so precisely and followed suit in the game of grab. But this is not all. The German Press is now calling upon its Government to seize a portion of Morocco. Die Post says:—"We are filled with shame that a Power like Spain, which is in no way comparable to the German Empire, has the courage and cleverness to demand and exercise its freedom of action in Morocco. After the disruption of the Algeciras Act by France, Germany officially announced her intention of doing something of the sort, but as yet has not screwed up her courage to do so."

Was there ever a more delightful comedy? Moulai Zin is fighting Moulai Hafid. The French are supporting Moulai Hafid. The Spaniards have landed behind the French, and now it only remains for the Germans to land behind the Spaniards, and we shall have the principal actors all on the stage at the same time, painting each other's backs with the same sign just like a well-known advertisement. They will be in the following order—Moulai Zin, Moulai Hafid, Bremond's Mehalla, Monier's Brigade, the Spanish, and then the Germans. Meanwhile the trade of the country is at a standstill; it is unsafe to travel anywhere, and the local postmen, who are usually respected in times of trouble, complain that unauthorised persons tickle them up, when discharging their onerous duties, with red-hot pokers and rob the mail-bags of postal-orders and cheques. The master of the situation is Moulai Hafid. He can sit at home and laugh whilst the others fight. He has long since renounced his ambitions to reign as an independent Shereefian monarch, and finds that he can have a much better time and a far safer one by making the French support his harem, whilst he encourages them to keep his unruly subjects in check. We do not know how this unique comedy will end, but, to quote an expressive if inelegant phrase, "It is high time some one got out of the gutter and let the water flow."

REVIEWS

FIVE MODERN THINKERS

Interpreters of Life and the Modern Spirit. By Archibald Henderson. (Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)

Oliver Wendell Holmes once wrote that "life is a great bundle of little things." Some such wide and expansive definition must have been present in Dr. Henderson's mind when he chose the title of this volume of critical essays. The "interpreters," whose lives and works are examined with varying thoroughness, are Meredith, Wilde, Maeterlinck, Ibsen, and George Bernard Shaw. To but one of these great writers can we trace that view of life of which we all need an interpretation; these men but faintly realised that the greatest thing in the world was to see with Ovid—"Vita data est utenda."

It is perhaps unfortunate that the first essay in Dr. Henderson's volume deals with George Meredith: this essay is the shortest, and, from all critical standpoints, is quite unworthy of notice. Dr. Henderson may not have intended that his work should be examined in this light, but everywhere in the essay on Meredith appears that transatlantic grandiloquence which the unlettered may mistake for criticism. We read of "the belated efflorescence of the repute of George Meredith," that "the educative influence of his fictive achievement, so arabesque, so fantastically kaleidoscopic, so ravishingly tortuous, yet withal so clear-visioned, so intense and so hardly sane, has been imperceptibly if glacially slow and sure." The word "glacially" may prove a refresher in the dog-days, but otherwise we do not understand its usage in this connection, though perchance Dr. Henderson wishes to suggest that Meredith's influence was "like a glacier." This careless choice of words in the hasty attempts to overwhelm the general reader is often apparent; there is too much of the dipping into the bran-tub of words. Then, again, Dr. Henderson illustrates his poverty and inability to apply criticism and analysis to Meredith by lengthy reference to Meredith's lack of popularity in this country. We do not suggest that the critic should be debarred from discussing the relations between an artist and the public—nay, we would encourage it. But let it be worth saying; let it attempt to solve the question at issue. Dr. Henderson seems to have chiefly utilised the theme so that literary America may receive some of that "laudation, tribute, and panegyric" which is due to it because there Meredith "found a more generally congenial and appreciative audience:"—

> Significant, indeed, is the circumstance that those two brilliant and whimsical exemplars of Celtic wit, paradox, fantasy, and imagination—radical, rationalistic, and intransigeant—George Meredith and George Bernard Shaw—found their first real general recognition and appreciation, neither in the land of adoption nor nationality, but in a land upon which they had never set foot. America anticipated England in her appreciation of Wagner, as to-day it outranks England in appreciation of Ibsen; and the catholicity of American taste finds further verification in its saner, more balanced general appreciation of George Meredith.

It is a great misfortune that Dr. Henderson cannot somehow include Shakespeare and Homer. All this may be true—we may deny and Dr. Henderson may affirm through eternity—but neither of us can disprove the other. Nevertheless, arguing from external evidence of the literature and drama of America, we are certain that this wonderful recognition has not left a very deep mark upon American letters.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Dr. Henderson makes no attempt to account for the gradual increase of popularity of Meredith's works. A well-known publisher once remarked, "Now Meredith is dead he will join Byron and the others in the never-read Christmas presents." We will not subscribe to this view; but we do feel that the memory of Meredith will need more than the soporifics of Dr. Henderson to sustain it. The author of these essays says in a characteristic sentence:—"George Meredith has never lacked for the most edifying appreciation at the hands of the masters of his own craft." The literary mandarins were correct in their judgment in this instance; still, envious spite and lack of critical faculty have often degraded the efforts of these gentlemen. Neither should we like to imagine Meredith as one of Mr. Wells' bath-chairmen. Meredith was born out of due time; he lived in a world beyond the ken of the ordinary reader; he possessed a philosophy, and he did not scruple to preach that philosophy. Why has Dickens always appealed to the general reader? What qualifications are required to appreciate Dickens? For the partial interpretation of Dickens all that is necessary is the ability to read; to interpret Meredith to the slightest extent the reader must possess the ability to think. There is no need to search for "some deadly canker of secret and devitalising force." The novel of mental and psychic adventure appeals to a small but, thanks to the spread of education, an increasing audience. There was no need for Meredith to thank God that he had never written a word merely to please: he could not—he would not debase his ideas of his art to tickle the susceptibilities of the "average man." The average man possesses no philosophy of life: he has no natural taste for Meredith. But when Meredith lays hold of him he sees visions: having acquired the taste, the appetite is insatiable. When a man has once seen what Meredith desires him to see, he always sees it. We have considered the essay on Meredith at such length because Meredith is in temperament the most English of the writers examined in this volume.

The essays on Wilde and Shaw are chronological and biographical in character, differing in this respect from the piecemeal article on Meredith. In parts these essays are bibliographical rather than critical; throughout the work is lacking in artistic insight. Youth is the period during which we most fully appreciate Wilde; later the stern realities of life cause us to scorn the artificiality, the straining after effect, that appears on every page. The word-magic is still entrancing, but it does not satisfy. Dr. Henderson is not convincing in his treatment of Wilde, and it is rather late for a literary critic to state that "the chief obstacle to the study of Wilde's plays has been Wilde." As Dr. Henderson's larger work on George Bernard Shaw has already been reviewed in these columns, we need not treat this portion of the present volume at any length.

The author's best work is seen in the remaining essays on Maeterlinck and Ibsen, and, shorn of verbal extravagances, these give the volume a real critical standing. Dr. Henderson rightly says that "to compare Maeterlinck's early poems with the 'unrhymed, loose rhythmic prose' of Walt Whitman is to make a perfectly obvious and yet at the same time perfectly irrelevant criticism. While both are disjointed, formless, enumerative, Maeterlinck's every line is charged with a certain vague significance, suggestive of subtile and ever subtler possibilities of interest." The silences and reiterations of Maeterlinck as illustrated in "The Sightless" are, indeed, masterly; we see the beginnings of that evolutionary process which led to the greater symbolism of "Monna Vanna." The dramatic genius of Maeterlinck, combined with his insight of the soul of the inanimate, and, with that poetic mysticism of which he is master, has produced plays possessing real dynamic qualities. He ennobles us, he enriches our vision, he causes our very hearts to vibrate with love of beauty and right—we are born again. Ibsen's method is very different. His spirit of revolt, his attempt to arouse the world, to persuade it to rid itself of base and shallow ideals, is a great contrast to Maeterlinck. Maeterlinck appeals to the poetic side of man's temperament and Ibsen to the humanitarian side; and there we must leave them.

Dr. Henderson's work is very unequal in quality, the style is often extremely irritating, and the critical value is greatly discounted by reason of superficial treatment. Nevertheless, "Interpreters of Life," in aiding the reader to find his own level and to test his own convictions, will serve a very useful purpose.

A. E. H.

MOTHER AND SON

The Mother of Goethe. By MARGARET REEKS. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

EVEN Lombroso has not solved for us the mystery of genius. The law of heredity certainly accounts for much in the moral and mental development of mankind generally, but it certainly does not altogether account for genius. Mrs. Annie Besant's theory, speculative as it is, furnishes, nevertheless, as suggestive an explanation as perhaps will be forthcoming in our generation—namely, that a genius is not the product of a single life but of a multitude of lives; that he chooses his parents and a fitting occasion when he can use his accumulated knowledge and power to the best advantage. Frau Aja, the mother of Goethe, had no such conceptions. She writes:—"I assure the folk that I have contributed nothing to make you the great man and poet you are (for I will not take praise which is not my due); perhaps a grain more or less of brain and you would have been quite an ordinary man, and when nothing is within, nothing can come out." Although Frau Aja, with characteristic frankness, denies all share in the making of her son's genius, she goes no further. Frau Aja looked upon Goethe's genius as something to rejoice in, something to be proud of. It was a sacred mystery, an unspeakable honour which she had not the slightest intention of analysing.

Miss Margaret Reeks has essayed a pleasant task in portraying Goethe's mother. The material for such a portrait is somewhat scanty, and the opening pages of the book are chiefly concerned with the youthful days of Hätschelhans. Curiously enough, we are given a more vivid conception of Goethe's father than his mother, perhaps for the simple reason that Herr Goethe's characteristics are more marked than those of his wife. An eccentric, narrow, and didactic personality has a way of forcing itself upon the memory. We can see him dominating every detail of the household; a pedagogue expecting his two children—Wolfgang (Hätschelhans) and Cornelia—to read through Power's "History of the Popes." Miss Reeks writes:—"His tastes must be their tastes, his carefully considered demands must be met by implicit obedience. He regulated their studies, their employments, their amusements. He would have regulated their thoughts with the same conscientious completeness, had that been possible." Fortunately genius is not swayed by parental authority, especially when the authority is at variance with the burning fire within. Had young Goethe listened to his father Germany would have heard of him as a lawyer and the world been without one of her greatest poets. Thus Goethe describes one of his father's dancing lessons:—"He never allowed himself to lose his composure, but taught us, most correctly, the positions and steps, and when he had got us forward enough to dance a minuet, he played something easy for us in 3-4 time on the flute-douce, and we attitudinised to it as best we might."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Miss Reeks, quick to seize a humorous situation, adds: "Surely a comical sight, the grave man pirouetting and bowing, with two little figures trying to imitate his stiff, elephantine motions." The Herr Rath was one of those who patronised art without the least qualification for so doing. The following is a delightful description of a family picture painted by Seekatz:—

> In a pastoral landscape, with a nondescript ruin in the foreground, composed of three meaningless columns and a sepulchral urn, a place most unlikely to be frequented by a German burgher's family, sat the Frau Rath, apparently talking eagerly (this at least was true to life): beside her stood the Herr Rath apparently listening (let us hope this was also true). Behind them appeared their two living children, Wolfgang, engaged in tying a red ribbon round a lamb's throat, Cornelia watching him perform this improbable feat. And—strange taste—in the distance was seen a group of winged cupids, or rather cherubim, representing the souls of the children. Surely the incongruity of composition deserves high admiration—father and mother in knee-breeches and hooped petticoat; Grecian urns, and cherubs!

Miss Reeks evidently thrills at the thought of Frau Aja's motherhood, and her joy is so great that on one occasion it confuses her meaning. She writes:—

> We imagine her walking up and down the "bird-cage," with the soft lulling movement dedicated to babies, whispering sweet nonsense against the baby cheek, catching the tossing baby hands with kisses.

It must be extremely difficult to catch a baby's hands and to kiss them at the same time.

Frau Aja writes in one of her letters: "I have sworn most sacredly never to mix or meddle again with my foolish foresight, but to live from day to day, to treasure up all small pleasures, but not to dissect them." This excellent resolution she carried out to the letter. She possessed a decidedly happy disposition, and while her husband was so set on standing on his dignity that he failed to stand on anything else, she, gay, lighthearted woman that she was, kept ever young with a lively imagination, a keen interest in her fellow-beings, and above all a quiet, deep love for her son. It is probable that her gaiety more than once concealed a sorrow. Even the mother of great sons has to make her sacrifices. Although Miss Reeks lays no emphasis on the fact that Goethe did not see his mother at the last, the knowledge that he did not come to her deathbed or the deathbed of his father in no way detracts from his genius. In this matter, however, he falls a little in our estimation of him as a man. Miss Reeks would have us think that Frau Aja did not want her boy to be pained by so distressing a scene—suggests, indeed, that he did not know until it was too late. This is scarcely likely to have been the case. Shortly after her husband's death she writes to Lavater about her son: "He has so much business to do at once—but he has written me in excuse a lovely letter, so I must possess my soul in patience." How proud she was of her boy's fame! We can picture her reading aloud to her friends passages from his latest book. We can hear the murmur of applause, and hear her exclaim when the reading is over, "He is my son!" She was just the woman for a mother of a genius. One of her most charming letters is to a boy friend of hers. She writes:—

> Listen, dear friend, to my proposal. As you are constantly with my son, and therefore, know more about him than any one, how would it be if you kept a small diary, and sent it to me every month? It would not give you much work, only something after this style: "Yesterday Goethe was at the theatre; in the evening was invited out; to-day we had company," and so on.

That gives us an insight into her mother-love, the clamouring for news of one who had ever been the supreme joy of her life. We may admire the genius of Goethe, but we find it in our hearts to love his mother. Such a motherhood as that of Frau Aja was worthy of the laurel-wreath the good people of Frankfurt took from the statue of her son and laid upon her grave. It may be that true motherhood is far greater than genius, but it will be a long time before the world will weave a crown to honour motherhood, higher and more beautiful than the crown of fame.

TABLOID WISDOM

Golden Thoughts of Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania. Translated by permission by H. Sutherland Edwards. (John Lane. 1s. net.)

Maxims and Musings. By the Marchioness Townshend. (Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Aphorisms and Reflections from the Works of T. H. Huxley. Selected by Henrietta A. Huxley. (Watts and Co. 6d.)

Aphorisms and Reflections on Life and Philosophy By Martyn P. Pollack. (Burman, Cooper and Co., Birmingham.)

The Queen.

Most of us, no doubt, are familiar with the "Maxims" of the famous French cynic, La Rochefoucauld, and not a few, perhaps, have already read the "Thoughts of a Queen," which originally appeared over twenty years ago, though the present publisher does not mention the fact. A new generation has, however, sprung up since then, and these "Thoughts," now qualified as "golden," and issued in a more portable form, should prove of interest both to the roaring lions and the sucking doves of the twentieth century. One of the greatest merits of these "Thoughts" is their originality. There are few of them indeed which are not absolutely new, and even those which are not quite new have been renovated by new expression; as, for instance:—

> Do not marry a woman whose mouth drops at the corners; even were the mouth a cherry, you would find the fruit bitter.

This had already been said ages before by a Persian poet. Not less remarkable than their striking originality is the endless variety of the "Thoughts," and there are numbers of them which, once read, can never be forgotten. This gifted royal lady is also the authoress of many poems, novelettes, fairy-tales, and dramas.

The Marchioness.

One has only to gaze at the personal presentment of the marchioness, beautifully reproduced in colour by the Dover Street Studios, Ltd., to be at once won by her "Maxims and Musings." Yet it is sad to think that one so young and fair should already, by a cruel fate, have been inoculated with the cynicism of La Rochefoucauld. It cannot be denied that the marchioness, in her short career, has gained some sad experience, especially in the Law Courts. Hence she tells us:—

> It is almost impossible to believe that a cross-examining

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Counsel is probably a very nice man at home, and quite kind to children and animals.

And again:—

> Always look at the letters you write from the point of view of a Court of Law.

An excellent piece of advice which the marchioness gives to her own sex is:—

> If you cannot marry the man you love, be sure to marry the man who loves you.

Yet how few of the daughters of Eve do so!

The marchioness is almost as severe on the Eternal Feminine as Miss Marie Corelli:—

> It is not odd that women are very often antagonistic to women: all female animals fight each other.
>
> Men like to compare women to lilies; but remember there are Tiger Lilies.

Yes, and Militant Suffragettes also!

This little book is very daintily got up, and is in all respects a credit to the authoress, the printer, and the publisher. Her Majesty the Queen-Mother has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of it.

THE PROFESSOR.

Mrs. Huxley is to be cordially thanked for compiling this little volume of selections from her distinguished husband's works. Some of the passages are chosen for their philosophy, some for their moral guidances, some for their scientific exposition of natural facts, or for their insight into social questions; others for their charms of imagination or genial humour, and many for their pure beauty of lucid English writing. These extracts are more especially destined for the working man, whose cause the Professor so ardently espoused, and who may not have the means to buy his complete works.

THE MERE MAN.

Here we have a booklet of Brummagem wisdom which is not by any means all pinchbeck. The young author has evidently already had some experience of the fair sex, for he sententiously tells us:—

> If woman's intellect were as keen as her tongue she would be irresistible.

But intellect or no intellect, tongue or no tongue, woman has been irresistible ever since the year 1. And Mr. Pollack goes far to prove this when he states:—

> Anger flies before a woman's smile like morning mists before the rising sun.

Yet that is nothing compared to "the witchcraft of a cunning kiss," of which Kit Marlowe tells us.

THE ART OF REJUVENATION

Print Restoration and Picture Cleaning. By MAURICE JAMES GUNN. (L. Upcott Gill. 6s. 6d. net.)

THE art of which Mr. Gunn is so persuasive an exponent is one which is in these days widely practised, and with extremely varied results. In old times, if legends speak true, the votaries of rejuvenation were more ambitious in their aims and more drastic in their methods—witness the episode of Medea and the daughters Pelias, and its disastrous ending. Medea is generally credited with having kept back some essential portion of her secret, and is denounced accordingly; and there is always a risk that some unhandy mortal, in following Mr. Gunn's directions, or in thinking that he does so, will come to grief and lay the blame at Mr. Gunn's door. But the fact is that in all such secrets there is always one incommunicable ingredient, the personality of the operator. Inanimate objects, like animate ones, are quite obviously sensitive to handling; a man who aspires to success in the paths marked out by Mr. Gunn needs "hands" as much as a jockey; and the clumsy-fingered and unsympathetic meddler in these mysteries needs to be warned off at the outset—"Procul, O procul este, profani!" is the word for such. The caution is the more necessary since Mr. Gunn's book, in its straightforward lucidity, will be the occasion of sore temptation to many an uninitiated one to lay hard and unskilful hands upon a soiled masterpiece to its mischief and, mayhap, destruction. Mr. Gunn himself realises the danger when in his preface he gives fair warning that some of the secrets of picture-cleaning are not for everybody; but this might also be said of much that is included in the book.

With these reservations, however, we have nothing but praise for Mr. Gunn's very clear and practical work. He speaks very kindly at the outset of the "professional restorer," but with rare exceptions he is surely a person to be avoided. Some few there are of that trade who can be trusted, but they are few. In fact, Mr. Gunn himself, on a later page, admits that "capable restorers of pictures are very few." We have seen some terrible works of "cleaning and restoring" perpetrated during the last few years upon pictures of real merit which would far better have been left untouched. But there is much that can be done for a print or a picture before the desperate remedy of "restoration" need be attempted; and it is here that Mr. Gunn is most helpful. He is also open to answering inquiries upon his suggestions, which most authors of this kind are not. The columns of the Bazaar, he tells us, are always open to those who find themselves in difficulties. This in itself is no small advantage. He preaches from no "coward's castle." The materials required for the purposes of which he treats—as is generally the case with practical men—are few and simple, and for the most part inexpensive. The instructions are admirable in their lucidity and practical sense—that sense which only comes from experience, and which can be recognised only—and then with delight—by those who have had experience. In the treatment of prints he seems to us especially sound, and his various "tips" could not be bettered. He gives capital hints, too, upon detecting "fakes," and the best and cleverest methods of so doing. Some of them, we confess, were new to us, and their ingenuity impresses us accordingly. His suggestions for the treatment of old water-colours are also capital. On the cleaning and repairing of oil-paintings he is equally good and instructive. He realises to the full how much easier it is to ruin a picture than to restore it, and he advises accordingly. His standard of the qualifications required for such a task is rightly high—the restorer, in his view, "must be as much an artist as the actual painter of the canvas." But cleaning is not impossible up to a certain point. Of oil varnishes he will have none, and rightly so. The process of simple cleaning with warm water, with or without soap, and with the humble potato in reserve as a second line of attack, is minutely described, and entirely coincides with our own experience.

In short, as we said at the outset, the book is one which can be commended heartily. We may add that an excellent series of illustrations adds greatly to its practical value, while several reproductions of old prints give a good idea of the nature of the treasures which judicious treatment may rescue from untimely destruction.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

FICTION

Oliver's Kind Women. By PHILIP GIBBS. (Herbert and Daniel. 6s.)

IT has not yet been forgotten, nor will it be for a long time to come, that Mr. Philip Gibbs wrote the striking Fleet Street novel entitled "The Street of Adventure." That book was one of the most considerable works of fiction published during the present decade. Mr. Gibbs has now put "Oliver's Kind Women" before the world through Messrs. Herbert and Daniel—a new name to us. We congratulate them on having secured for their opening list a novel by such a powerful pen. If Mr. Gibbs' new book does not move us to the enthusiasm which we felt after reading "The Street of Adventure," nevertheless we are very greatly struck by it. Oliver, it must be confessed, is a thoroughly egotistical, objectionable person who takes everything he can get, as by right, and gives nothing in return. He has not even the excuse of being a genius. His whole work seems to consist of some six short stories in sundry magazines. Although we dislike him whole-heartedly, the book is written with such skill, such a wealth of vivid description of London life in all its aspects, such delightful characterisation, that we were compelled to read to the end to find out what became of the inflated hero to whom all women were kind. Mr. Gibbs is to be congratulated not only upon the forcefulness of his descriptions, but upon the delicacy of his humour, which stirs one to laughter at the most unexpected moments. The young girl journalist, Katherine Halstead, who struggled along the hard pavement of Fleet Street, and whose days and nights were dedicated to the quest of "scoops" in "The Street of Adventure" is met again here in the person of Katherine Goldstein, wife of an enormously rich German baron.

In her Chippendale-furnished rooms, palace-like in their richness and luxury, she entertains all her old fellow-workers—Grattan, Luttrell, and the others. All her old wilfulness and whimsicality remain with her. Having married solely for money, she hates herself for it, and yet would not give it up for anything in the world, even complete happiness or love. She is the personification of femininity. The attitude of the suburban father towards the great Oliver—the coming literary genius—the wonder, admiration, and even awe with which he eyes his clothes and listens to the highly coloured accounts of his life, when all the time Oliver is really being kept by the old man, who works overtime and stints and scrapes to make him a monthly allowance, is almost a tragedy, and intensifies a hundred times the utter worthlessness of the hero. As a student of temperament, Mr. Philip Gibbs is some inches taller than in any of his former work. Certainly his vivisection, because that is what it comes to, of this complete egoist is done with the master hand of a surgeon. Nevertheless, we think that Mr. Philip Gibbs would be well advised to devote himself in future to the portraiture of charming people, of whom he seems to know so many. There are not many readers, after all, who go out of their way in everyday life to associate with cads, however glorified. Why, then, should they be expected to spend an evening with them in the pages of a novel?

The Garden of Resurrection. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

IT seems to us that Bellwattle—a curious nickname for a very nice lady—was quite right when she told Mr. Bellairs that he was morbid about his ugliness. Although he may have been badly pockmarked and perhaps not originally endowed with a Greek perfection of feature, it was hardly necessary for him to wander so disconsolately through life, believing himself a monster of unattractiveness. He was really a charming gentleman in a mournful and at times slightly ridiculous way. Mr. Thurston has succeeded with great neatness in doing that rather difficult thing, which is to make his hero tell his own story and remain the only person in or out of it who is ignorant of his attractions.

In Mr. Bellairs' quixotic venture of going to Ireland to warn a helpless young girl whom a cad had brought over from Dominica to marry, and imprisoned in the house of his two she-dragons of aunts, we have nothing to lament except that he did not carry it out with more dash. He failed to make her believe his warning, and received as thanks a promise that the fair Dominican would pray never to look upon him again. This upset Mr. Bellairs very much, as he was already in love with her. We think Mr. Thurston insists a little too much on his hopelessness of inspiring a reciprocal passion. Mr. Bellairs, who had longed so earnestly for romance, scarcely realised it when it came. But he acted entirely in character, and that is the main thing in a sentimental romance just as much as in a blood-and-iron work of realism. We were genuinely pleased when he received his final reward. Mr. Thurston possesses that derided but not inestimable gift of painting a man who is a gentleman in all he does; he is also a writer of a rare studiousness, incapable of bad grammar and scorning an ugly cadence. He is hardly robust enough to move us very deeply, but he has in a marked degree the gift of being entirely readable. We hesitate to say that he has charm, because that word has been so cheapened by being bestowed where it is not deserved; but if Mr. Thurston does not object to sharing the quality with a good many rather questionable folk, we cannot withhold it from him.

Dick Comerford's Wager. By ARCHER PHILIP CROUCH. (Robert Scott. 6s.)

To relate the story of "Dick Comerford's Wager" Mr. Crouch takes his readers back one hundred years—to that most romantic of times when the hoot of the motor was unknown and ladies journeying from one town to another were at the mercy of the driver, the roads, and any highwayman who happened to be on the look-out for pillage. This, however, is not a tale of stirring adventure, but is merely concerned with the breakdown of a post-chaise containing a young lady named Betty and her aunt, who are forced to seek refuge at a village inn, where also comes Dick Comerford, a young man who, in accordance with the terms of his uncle's will, loses his fortune if he is unmarried on his twenty-fifth birthday, which is in ten days' time. Dick is accompanied by three companions, and over a bottle of claret the conspirators force Dick to make a bet that he will propose to the next girl he sees, immediately upon which proposition Betty enters the room. Dick fulfils his part of the bargain, and as Betty is masquerading as her maid endless complications ensue. Our author steers through them all in a very bright and entertaining manner, and the story reads brightly on to the end, when, needless to say, Dick does not lose his fortune. A little more care might have been taken with regard to the grammar in many portions of the book, but with this reservation we have no complaint to make.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE THEATRE

"THE CRUCIBLE" AT THE COMEDY THEATRE

Mr. Pelissier must look to himself. Suddenly, with none of the preliminary fanfare of trumpets which is heard so often and dies away so quickly, two writers have come to London and taken it by storm. Ignoring the old adage that a cobbler should stick to his last, Mr. Hemmerde, K.C., and Mr. Neilson, M.P., have plumped for play-writing. Already they have achieved something like a record. "The Butterfly on the Wheel," a serious play, is one of the genuine successes of the season, and "The Crucible," just produced, is quite likely to do as well. The latter piece is, however, not serious. It is the most subtle and delicious burlesque of the drawing-room melodrama that has perhaps ever been seen. Nothing that Mr. Pelissier has done can come within arm's length of it, and when playgoers discover the little joke, when it dawns upon them that the play which has been held up to ridicule and torn to shreds is not what it purports to be at all, amazement and boredom will be replaced by Homeric laughter and Mr. Henry Ainley will become Mr. Pelissier's only rival.

Mark Melstrode is one of those strong, grim, hard, true, hideously rich, silent Americans who tremble, curse, lie, cringe, storm, and deliver recitations all day long and far into the night. He parts his hair in the centre, smokes inferior cigars, and paces the room restlessly, dressed in a suit of ready-made blue serge. He thinks no more of sending cables than mere ordinary human men think of buying a halfpenny evening paper. "Gee whiz!" says he, "whaat do I care, any way? A million dollars is no more ter me, Sir, than a split pea to a 'possum"—or words to that effect. So, with more money than he can count or spend, Mark leaves his native atmosphere of spittoons and boost and invades London. We find him in a house evidently built by himself—a sort of Selfridge house, presumably, because it is always filled with the whole of Society, the Stage, and Politics, and yet there seems to be no over-crowding—in a small room, with comic doors, which is filled with telephones and title-deeds and the reek of cheap cigars. Through a large window, over which is painted a symbolic scene of ships and antelopes, one obtains a magnificent view of the Botanical Gardens, Windsor Castle, the flagstaff on Wimbledon Common, and Harrow-on-the-Hill. Like all millionaires, Mark is very particular about his views. With an elderly Irish secretary, to whom he is, of course, very rude, this great big white man, who might easily be mistaken for a nigger, breaks combines, crumples up trusts, thumps desks, takes pot-shots at the populace with half-smoked cigars, and talks in bad blank verse and imitation Bret Hartese about himself and his past.

Do not run away with the idea, however, that he devotes all his time to Melstrode rhapsodies. He is, as a matter of fact, a man of many hobbies. One of them is to break Morrison or Robinson—a man, at any rate, who lives somewhere, and has done something, but who must be wrung dry and hung out in the rain. He does this by cable. He is also "getting even" with London society, because, departing from its habits, it has refused to accept Mark for himself alone. This he does by inviting aristocracy to his emporium, and leaving it to the tender mercies of the Duchess of Droone, who is a very fascinating woman with an American accent, and a way of turning at the door and going "Ha! ha!" She is, however, a quite typical Duchess, an easily recognisable Duchess, because she not only loves Mark, but tells him so, and because, when told by him in his irresistible millionaire way to "Git, Georgie," she stays—dear, splendid, brave Englishwoman—sinks into a sofa, shows a good deal of stocking, and goes "Ha! ha!" Typical Duchess indeed. She is dealing with a millionaire who calls her Georgie. No loving woman "gits" from the presence of such a man empty-handed. Realising this, Mark ponders for a moment, throws at her the lease of a house in Grosvenor Square, and pushes her into the passage. Upon which, more typical than ever, she turns, goes "Ha! ha!" as before, and droones away. All this is merely an episode. We have not yet arrived at the great test scene.

We gather from the many pieces of excruciating Bret Hartese, already strongly and emotionally delivered, that Mark has been hurt in his youth. A woman loved him and left him to marry another—perhaps it was Morrison or Robinson—before he could give her a lease. He found her camp-fire smouldering where the mosquitoes zooned and bronchos busted and the sun went out with a hiss. Like all millionaires, Mark is very careful about his local colour. All the same, he now loves the beautiful Mary Strawardine, all too slight and delicate to bear a name so heavy and so foolish. Gee! how he loves that woman, boys! The mere thought of her turns the silent, strong, grim man into a Sicilian actor. She shall, she must be his, anyway. One woman had hurt him, remember. All women would therefore hurt him, so, like the strong man that he was, he will marry her without making her his wife, a perfectly conceivable and even logical conclusion to which a typical American millionaire would naturally come.

Now, the beautiful Mary is one of those aristocrats who spend the greater part of their lives at the Melstrode emporium listening to his mechanical piano-player and sipping iced water. Like Georgie Duchess of Droone and the Countess of Drayton and the wordless discreet servant who invariably brought in their cards on a tray—Mark collected cards, and brought this pleasant and harmless custom from America—Mary wandered in and out; sometimes she borrowed a million or two from Mark, sometimes she merely comes up because the piano-player's ragtimes give her a headache. This time she comes in order to show Mark how typically English she is. She proceeds to do so by stretching out her arms and telling him, in the beautiful English of the drawing-room ballad, how much she loves him and how dearly she desires to be the mother of his sons. Poor Mr. Pelissier. He has never perpetrated anything so delicious as this. Sensation, as might have been expected. Mark "shunts" his faithful Irishman, kicks out his Dundreary lawyer, and hides the emotional young man who has come to ask for £20,000 behind a cushion. Ah! then this is the Great Test Scene. We are now going to see a woman tried in the fire. Gee whiz, boys! grip hold and breathe slowly. This is life as they have it at the Elephant and Castle Theatre. My! how it hurts!

"I love yer, yep; see here, I love yer anyway," says Mark, sending a series of almost perfect smoke rings into Mary's face, one after another. "But right now I tell yer this. I shall never lead yer to the good old altar. You're soft pine."

Mary reels. She had a Scots mother. "Do not offend my Christian and wholly well-bred ears," she cries colloquially, "by a statement so brusque, so coarse, so callous. Would that I could fall in with your disingenuous suggestion, but there is in me the remnants of an effete prejudice which makes consent impossible. Oh, oh, . . . oh."

There is a short pause for another reel, and then out comes brother Kenyon, for such is his name. "How dare you!" he hisses, turning pale to the roots of his hair, and drawing himself to his full height, "How dare you! You may give me twenty thousand of the best, but you may not talk to my little sister like that!"

In the meantime, Mary has flung herself into the sofa in a passion of weeping. Not to be outdone, Kenyon does the same thing upon the floor. He always goes one better. And then Mark deliberately strides to the window, aims his cigar at Windsor Castle and—misses it. He lights another, throws the match at the flamboyant Etonian, now of Throgmorton-street, and sends out a cloud of smoke at Mary. "Say," says he, with some vibrato, "did I ever tell you the long, true story of my life from the time when I was a babby until I got hurt beneath the Dogger Bank?"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There is no answer. Both Kenyon and Mary are typical aristocrats, and far too well bred to run away. And so for the tenth time in two hours Melstrode talks of mosquitoes and broncho-busters and the hissing sun, dragging in once more the old camp-fire. It is very beautiful and typical. It is the most delicious satire.

But Kenyon, who can stand a good deal, cannot, after all, stand that. He springs up, pulls out the revolver, which it is now the smart thing for every old Etonian to carry, especially if he is in Throgmorton-street by day, and levels it at his sister.

"Fire!" she cries, knowing that it isn't loaded.

"Ha, ha," cries the boy who met George, Duchess of Droone, and introduced her business to his firm. The commission paid his cigarette bill.

"Gee!" shouts Mark, shaken out of his usual composure.

But the boy, who is not naturally dramatic, faints. His surprise at his unconventional behaviour is so great. What would Throgmorton Street have said? And the curtain falls. Luckily there is one more Act. There might easily have been a dozen more. Georgie has gone to see the house in Grosvenor-square, but the Countess, as they all called her, typically, comes up from the piano-player and adds tone to the scene. More cards are brought up, Morrison or Robinson is broken, Mark is even ruder to his faithful Irishman, who takes Kenyon away to give him the small sum he needs, and Mary remains. Whereupon, unbelievable as it may seem, Mark once more recites the story of his life from the beginning. Bombast and mixed metaphor roll from his lips. Never had egoism reached such a point, and, then, utterly worn out and determined at last to make some sort of stand, Mary seized her opportunity and delivered an article from the Daily Chronicle on Motherhood. Her peroration is very direct if a trifle irrelevant. "All or nothing," she says, "All or nothing." The great, strong man even then seems disinclined to give way and promise marriage, and if Mary had not seized him in her arms the curtain would never have come down.

That, so far as we could follow it, is the story of "The Crucible." It is an epoch-making skit, a burlesque of the servants' novelette and the suburban drama of high life, which might have been written by Dr. Stephen Leacock, author of "Nonsense Novels," and we can imagine hundreds of people getting immense amusement at the Comedy Theatre so long as the play is there. Mr. Ainley as Mark showed a keen sense of humour. He did not forget for one moment that he was in farce. He entered into the spirit of the thing whole-heartedly. His vulgarity was exquisite; his noise excruciating. A fine performance. Miss D'Alroy did very well, but was altogether too pretty, too charming. Mr. Owen Nares was excellent. Mr. Hemmerde and Mr. Neilson are to be congratulated. They have relit the lamp of burlesque.

THE COURT THEATRE

The Irish Players

One of the most interesting questions in connection with the Abbey Theatre Players is whether the younger blood is to maintain the initial inspiration that first gave rise to the movement. It is one thing to light a torch at the fire of life; it is quite another to pass the brand on aflame and fierce. As most know (or should know), the venture was originally founded chiefly because certain persons, notably W. B. Yeats, had plays which they wished acted, and which it was obvious no commercial theatre could ever be induced to produce. Very soon after its foundation the mordant, rich genius of Synge brought its power to the movement. Thus the "Irish Literary Theatre" existed largely to put on the work of such as these. Now it exists to be written for: a somewhat different thing and a more perilous. Truly it has passed the opening of the stage of fluctuation long since; yet that stage is not yet over, and the present season at the Court forms an exceedingly interesting study.

For example, on Monday, the 5th, we had "The Playboy," by Synge; on Thursday, the 8th, we had Yeats' poem, "Deirdre;" and every evening has concluded with one of Lady Gregory's inimitable sketches of rich humour. "The Playboy" we know. "Deirdre" is not, indeed, drama; it is more truly a poem. It is not always recognised that dramatic poetry has a further division beyond the two generally admitted, of closet drama and poetic drama. There is a further type exemplified by "Deirdre," which is neither closet drama, like the "Dynasts," nor poetic drama, like "King Lear," but a poem phrased in the characters of legend or myth; a poem which we may well enjoy reading, but which we demand to see pourtrayed on the stage, equably and without vigour of stress, as though a phantasy had swept on our brain, and in a dream of beauty we perceived an ancient tapestry step into life. Of such a type is "Deirdre." It is not drama; strictly speaking, W. B. Yeats is not a dramatist (no dramatist could ever have penned the "Wind among the Reeds"); and those who condemn, as some critics on Thursday did condemn, "Deirdre" for not being rich drama like "The Playboy," thereby lay bare their lack of critical insight. But that is not to say there is no room for it on the stage. Neither Deirdre nor Naisi (nor, for that matter, Conchubar, though it is less true there) are instinct with life; they have no blood in their veins, neither have they any heat of desire; they are the subjects of a dream, and the three singing women are the agents that upcall the dream. And surely we all love a dream, however much a thing apart it be.

Yet these we know; but a newer challenge was given us on Wednesday in the presentation for the first time in London of "Mixed Marriage," by St. John Ervine, and on Thursday by the similar production of "Birthright," by T. C. Murray. As to the first, if we had not known that Mr. St. John Ervine was a journalist in London, and a Fabian, we might have guessed it. All the Fabian preoccupation with political problems was there, with, moreover, the desire to draw the obvious moral that tokens the journalist whose native business it is. John Rainey is that unhappy imitation of the dour Scotsman that Belfast is enabled to produce by reason of its proximity to Scotland. He is a Protestant, in all the severe etymological meaning of that word, and an Orangeman. Like most bigots, he is passably ignorant: Sinn Feiners and Catholics are one to him with Socialists and Labour men. When discovered to us he has just come home to inform his wife that he with the rest of the men have come out on strike. This is the first place in which Mr. Ervine fails. This task of placing the audience in full information as to the situation, and yet to let the information emerge in the proper and natural business of dialogue, is of all tasks the most critical set for the playwright. Yet where John Rainey asks petulantly for the evening paper, and his wife asks "Was there anythin' pertickler ye wur wantin' t' see in it?" to get the reply,

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Aye, about the strack," it is too palpable a manœuvre to win through, and an unhappy prejudice is bred in the listening mind.

However, the information is conveyed. Then it transpires that of their two sons the elder, Hugh, is not the man his father would wish him to be. He mixes, for instance, with a Michael O'Hara, who is a Papist and Labour man; and—deadly thing!—he is keeping company with a Papist girl, Nora Murray by name. The younger son, in the language of the schools, does not "function;" he wanders through the play to give it rondure, and help it round difficult corners. It is with the elder son the trouble lies. He informs his mother that he proposes to marry Nora, and they agree to keep the knowledge from the father till the strike is over. For Michael O'Hara is taking a prominent part in the strike; and, to save Orange and Green Riots, such as would ruin the men's chances, he has persuaded Mr. Rainey to keep peace between the two. But Rainey discovers it for himself, and by eavesdropping too, which is bad for him, and bad for Mr. Ervine. Moreover, he discovers it on the very day he is expected to speak in favour of religious peace. At once his fury is aroused: he declares he will speak in favour of religious war, unless Hugh gives up Nora or Nora gives up Hugh. It is all a bit involved, and Mr. Ervine does not aid the involutions with likelihood. For instance, when Rainey goes out, the air is full of irresolution, not of war, and we feel the playwright's hand waver.

The end is, however, that he speaks in favour of war, and the fourth scene opens with a riot surging about Rainey's house. Exactly why the mob should be there is not quite clear, except that it seems to be demanding Nora, who is being protected in the house, Rainey or no Rainey. If it is weak it is at least exciting. We hear stones; we hear the Riot Act being read; we hear volleys of muskets; we hear the roar of the riot. Nora is distraught, taking the blame on herself. In the end, to save the bloodshed of musket fire, she runs out desperately, and falls back shot. Then, and only then, Mr. Ervine rises to the situation. Looking on the mischief he has wrought, John Rainey says: "Ah was right. Ah know Ah was right;" and his wife, reading the soul behind the words, strokes him gently, saying, "Aw, my poor man, my poor man!" No; there is not much to arouse enthusiasm in this play: it is didactic; it is Fabian; and it is unconvincing in theme and technique, despite many excellencies. And in any case its four Acts did not aid it. Three would have sufficed, for the second and third were strictly one, and too long at that.

It was somewhat suspiciously, therefore, we expected "Birthright," a suspicion that passed to tense interest very early in the play. Not since Synge do we remember anything with so much of the strength and beauty of drama. The story itself was quite a simple one, and furthermore its simplicity was primal and fierce. It had nothing political in it, for its situation was before all politics and higher than all politics. It was not intellectual, in the misunderstood meaning of that word, but passionate; and it therefore laid hold of the whole emotion. Bat Morrissey was a man who, early in life, had made a little money in America, and, returning to Ireland, had bought a farm in the County Cork. Hard work he had put into the farm, till he turned it from bareness to sweetness, and he could say, "The sweat o' my body an' my life is in every inch of the land." His sons are two—Hugh, the elder, a young man who has turned to culture, writes verses for the Feis, is captain of the hurley team, and is a great favourite in the neighbourhood; and Shane, the younger, somewhat dour, and with no interests outside the farm. Yet the farm is Hugh's birthright, and so Shane determines to go to America. Shane is old Bat's right hand, while Hugh he is contemptuous of, he being alien to him. And the old mother, thinking no harm, wishing no favouritism, has ever favoured the elder against the younger, till Shane has black hatred bred in his heart.

Thus the four characters are set out: Old Bat, bitter at Shane's appreciation to go, and bitter against Hugh's more cultured desires; Hugh, gay, accomplished, a favourite everywhere; Shane, dour, but with a dourness that his mother's unwitting neglect has bred in him; and old Maura, loving both sons, yet over tender to Hugh, for she herself has gentle blood in her veins, and Hugh is attuned to her instincts. Each possesses our full sympathy, and thus the catastrophe is singularly purging. Bat, in a fury of anger at what he terms Hugh's neglect of the farm, decides that Hugh shall forego his birthright, and go to America instead of Shane. The catastrophe is delayed with rare skill, till, at the ripe psychological moment, Hugh and Shane fight, and Shane discovers to his horror that he has killed his brother. The scene closes as Shane disappears terror-stricken into the night, and Maura wails over Hugh's body, Bat gazing on in horror. It is a strong play. The subtle omens that hint the end all through the play bespeak the instinctive dramatist. There is excellent draughtsmanship here; but, more than all, there is a grip on the primal emotions such as, to speak deliberately, one is at a loss to discover in any present-day dramatic work. While there are dramatists such as Mr. Murray the Abbey Theatre is secure. We understand that he is a master in one of the State schools in the county Cork. Since seeing the play we have read it carefully in Messrs. Maunsell's edition, and there is the same fierce power and strength of beauty in the printed page as on the boards. It would be unfair to close without speaking of Eileen O'Doherty's interpretation of the part of Maura. With these Irish Players all the acting is good; but this performance stands out as exceptional even among the best. The appeal to tears was never overstrained; and, being sure in its stroke, it filled the mind with tears that were too full to overflow. Mr. Sidney Morgan, as Bat, had a fierce, rugged strength that yet never lost our understanding and our sympathy.

Lady Gregory's plays scarcely demand praise, so well known are they. Suffice it to say that "The Workhouse Ward" and "The Rising of the Moon" were as richly humorous and full of sympathy as ever.

"THE MARRIED WOMAN" AT THE ALDWYCH

THE eternal triangle, of which the novel-reading and play-going public must by this time be somewhat weary—the woman, the husband, and the lover—found a fresh setting in Mr. C. B. Fernald's play, presented on Sunday and Monday last by the Incorporated Stage Society. The acting was admirable, and at times brilliant; the dialogue abounded in smart epigram; the construction was good; but the treatment of the theme showed no attempt to break away from conventional lines. Sylvia Temple, who has married an "early-Victorian blockhead," even while half-fearing to commit her life's happiness to him, is in due course disillusioned. Two years after the wedding, for the second time she takes the extraordinary procedure of summoning the brave, pure, stalwart lover (who is addicted to leaving for Liverpool or Alaska at critical moments) to see if he can unravel the tangle—she had done so on the eve of her marriage, much to the horror of the assembled family. The brave, pure stalwart is a good, dear, strong fellow, who stands rigid and unresponsive, despite the tumult in his heart, while Sylvia hangs round his neck, and beseeches him to take her. No! He must catch the next train for Liverpool; he must get away to give her time to think over her position. In three months he will return, and then, if she still wishes it, he will take her and shelter her, and face the world's opprobrium. So he departs, and, we hope, catches his train, and the curtain descends to the sobbing inquiry of the heroine, "What shall I do?"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It will be seen that there is nothing startling in all this. The cleverness of the dialogue, however, and the excellence of the acting saved the play from becoming diluted Ibsen or an imitation of Shaw. There was hardly an uninteresting minute in the whole of the three Acts, and the various scenes with Sylvia's ineffable parents were genuinely amusing. The parts of the seniors were in the capable hands of Mr. A. S. Homewood and Mrs. A. B. Tapping; Alice Mathewson and Henry Mathewson, Sylvia's sister and brother-in-law, were capitally played by Miss Nannie Bennett and Mr. Frederick Lloyd; Miss Grace Croft gave a good interpretation of the worried Sylvia; Mr. Hubert Harben as her husband, and Mr. Norman Trevor as her immaculate lover, gave no cause for complaint. In spite of its lack of originality, as far as the plot is concerned, "The Married Woman" would have a long and successful run, we imagine, if staged in the usual way at a West-end theatre.

DUKE OF YORK'S THEATRE

Miss Marie Tempest has revived that amusing little comedy "The Marriage of Kitty" at the Duke of York's Theatre, and, judging from the laughter with which it was received, it should have a fairly long innings. With her inimitable self in the title-part, and her astounding change from the Kitty of the country—a regular "fright"—to the Kitty of the town—a very sophisticated and alluring lady indeed—she brought the house down; this reversal of the performance of Miss Ethel Irving in "Lady Frederick" must be seen to be believed. The witticisms were obviously toned down from a more liberal French interpretation, and at times the farcical element seemed over-emphasised by those who ably supported Miss Tempest, but on the whole praise and not blame will be the verdict of even the most captious critic. Mr. J. R. Crauford as John Travers was excellent, and Miss Marie Polini in the part of Madame de Semiano caught the spirit of the comedy quite happily. "The Marriage of Kitty" may not be high art, but in the hands of its present exponents it is thoroughly artistic and provocative of laughter every few minutes—especially when Mr. Graham Browne appears in the toils of his many puzzling situations.

Miss Ellen Terry delivered the second of her charming lectures on the heroines of Shakespeare at the Garrick Theatre last Sunday evening, under the auspices of the Pioneer Players. In the course of her causerie Miss Terry gave with fine effect the love scene between Benedict and Beatrice, and treated at varying length the characters of Portia, Rosalind, Celia, and others. Musical selections, given upon the harpsichord by Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse, were a pleasant feature in the enjoyable evening.

THE SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL AT HIS MAJESTY'S

"THE TAMING OF THE SHREW"

What a versatile actor is Mr. F. R. Benson, and what an excellent, highly trained, experienced company he has to support him! They seem to breathe the very atmosphere of Shakespeare and of Elizabethan England. It is such a relief to see a company at work who really give one the impression of having studied Shakespeare's plays from childhood, and who do not act as if they had picked up the book a few days before the production, and merely learnt the words by heart. On Tuesday last we saw them in the tragedy of "Richard III.," and thought that performance could hardly have been surpassed, but on Friday afternoon, in the comedy of "The Taming of the Shrew," they were even better, and Mr. Benson's performance of Petruchio was a masterpiece. "The Taming of the Shrew" is not often seen on the stage, and has never been one of Shakespeare's most popular plays; but it is an excellent comedy, full of humorous dialogue and ever-changing dramatic situations.

It is difficult to understand why it does not enjoy a greater popularity, but perhaps the reason is that it is an unnatural comedy, and Shakespeare when he wrote allowed his fancy to aim after an unattainable ideal, which could never be regarded with favour by the female sex. But to the worried husband or disappointed suitor it is an excellent antidote, and he can sit at the theatre for a few hours and flatter himself with the illusion that one day he himself may meet with the same success as Petruchio, although, as far as we know, there is no authentic recorded instance of the successful breaking-in of a wayward woman. We left the theatre under the impression that Petruchio's triumph was but a transitory one, and that he will pay dearly for it later on in the sanctity of his own home. The scene in which the play is laid is almost as unnatural as the triumph of man over woman which it pourtrays. We have all the rough horse-play and humour of Elizabethan England transposed to an Italian setting. The jokes of Petruchio's servants would be far more suitable to the inns and stables of Elizabethan England than amidst the culture and civilisation of mediæval Italy. The play also shows Shakespeare's unrivalled genius for unravelling a tangled skein of characters, plots, and counterplots. Unless you are previously well acquainted with the piece, it requires great concentration of mind to follow the varying fortunes and substitutions of the rival lovers and suitors, but when the curtain finally falls the mystery is completely cleared up and each rôle stands out as clear as a cameo.

We need say nothing further of Benson's performance of Petruchio, except that it could hardly have been excelled. His light-heartedness and affectation of severity towards his wife made an irresistible appeal to the audience. Mrs. Benson was excellent as Katharina the Shrew, and Miss Ethel McDowall made a very pretty Bianca. Mr. Murray Carrington looked very handsome and very Italian as Lucentio, and also we were pleased with the performances of M. Alfred Brydone as Baptista and of Mr. Matthew Boulton as Vincentio. In fact the whole company deserve any eulogiums which may be showered on them.

MRS. BESANT AT THE QUEEN'S HALL

Before a crowded audience at the Queen's Hall on Sunday evening last Mrs. Annie Besant delivered the first of a series of five lectures dealing with "The Immediate Future." For over an hour the audience was held in rapt attention as Mrs. Besant discoursed on "Impending Physical Changes" and the problems which suggested themselves to her as needing explanation. The recent emergence of certain islands and the number of earthquakes might be regarded as signs of a new continent to appear in the Pacific Ocean; and while this continent is slowly forming the race that is to inhabit it is slowly preparing in the adjacent country of America. "Unless these changes take place from time to time," said Mrs. Besant, "the earth would not be able to support her children." She noted at some length and very interestingly the development of a new type of humanity—the sixth subdivision of the great Aryan people, the new race growing up in America with marks distinct and clear, full of intellect and power.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

As was to be anticipated, Mrs. Besant treated largely on the subject of India, and emphasised that country's position as an integral part of the Empire. In concluding, she suggested that we should try to grasp the changes in progress as a whole, not as isolated facts, but as part of a Divine plan, leading in the end to unity and possibly a world-peace. "No nation," she observed, "may go against righteousness and against mercy and hope to keep its place in the world."

INDIAN AND COLONIAL REVIEWS, ETC.

THE last three issues of The Wednesday Review of India which have reached us contain some energetic criticisms upon the proposed Hindu University, and "Crystal Gazer," introducing his theme by a neat little essay on fads and faddists, expresses his doubts as to the benefits likely to arise from it. There is a great deal of sound common sense in his contention that the money, instead of going to create a new University, should rather be applied to the endowment and improvement of the Colleges which already exist. The issue for May 3rd reproduces one of Mr. Richard Middleton's Belgian articles which appeared in THE ACADEMY, and contains a very interesting paper by Mr. C. K. Vyasa Rao, B.A., on the question of a member of the Royal Family becoming a statutory Viceroy for India, with powers entirely separate from those of the Governor-General. In the number for May 17th is a capital descriptive article on Benares, by Mr. Rajani Sen, B.L. We cannot say much for the poetic contributions which The Wednesday Review publishes, but good verse is nearly always at a premium.

The Southern Sphere of Melbourne for May is a very fine issue in every respect, and the quality of its illustrations renders it especially acceptable. Full-page studies are included of the Hon. Alfred Deakin and Sir Thomas Gibson-Carmichael, in characteristic attitudes, very appropriate at the present time. The reading-matter is also on a high level; there is a good article entitled "Some Political Orators," comparing Mr. Deakin with the leading figures in the arena of current British politics—although we should hardly include Lord Rosebery at the present juncture in this category. Sports and recreations are thoroughly treated, and the short story of "An Interrupted Coronation Trip" is distinctly amusing.

One of the best and most original magazines from the United States is The International, edited by B. Russell Herts and Richard Le Gallienne. The June number starts with a rousing editorial by Mr. Herts on Education, taking for its text the recent compulsory resignation of Professor Spingarn from Columbia University. It will be remembered that we reviewed Professor Spingarn's lecture, "The New Criticism," very favourably in our issue of March 25th, and, with slight acquaintance with the circumstances, we cannot but regret that so lucid and logical an exponent of literature is lost to Columbia. "What a small percentage of the day in our grammar-schools, high schools, or colleges," says Mr. Herts, "is really spent in effort that may be regarded as useful! . . . No sane human being can grow up into manhood or womanhood without in some measure realising the uselessness of most of what he or she has learned. Many instructors are in as open rebellion against conditions as they dare to be." The writer goes on to treat the deadening influence of a course of study at many of the American Universities, and his outspoken criticism, though mainly destructive, must do good. An excellent article on the late Sir Francis Galton and a symposium on Divorce are two of the most interesting remaining features of The International, and we may note that its reviewing is as brisk and "spicy" as ever, although we do not agree with some of the criticisms on the work of Mr. Arnold Bennett.

THE HOME UNIVERSITIES

The Cambridge Review for June 7th contains much that will interest outside readers—a short unpublished letter by Charles Lamb, for instance, with a comment by Mr. E. V. Lucas, will appeal to students of "Elia." The "May Week Supplement" is most smart and racy. "Homo Sapiens," an article purporting to be written by a Martian, is caustic at the expense of poor humanity, and occasionally witty, as when it divides "Homo" into three classes—"Workers, Soldiers, and Nursemaids"—and states that "it is the duty of the last to promote the development of the young by exposing them to the direct rays of the sun." A satiric set of verses signed "Jingle" is capital, though the last stanza, which we quote, is reminiscent of Austin Dobson's "Ballade of Imitation":—

And if some day you are telling of a memorable score,
  Or a something that was said by So-and-So,
And the hearers seem to fancy they have heard it once before,
  And (it may be) not so very long ago,
Then your inner satisfaction you serenely may renew,
  Taking this for consolation with a jest,
That the wise and witty savings of the many (and the few)
  Are a repetition-lesson at the best!

A delightful sketch of an undergraduate who tried his hardest to do good to all and sundry of his fellows only to be frustrated—deservedly so, for he was a rare prig—is entitled "Misunderstood," and is the best contribution considered from a purely literary point of view; and the issue concludes with a really thrilling story of the supernatural.

AN OXFORD LECTURE

The President of Magdalen College, Professor T. H. Warren, M.A., D.C.L., delivered his inaugural lecture on "Oxford and Poetry" in the Sheldonian Theatre on June 2nd, and it has since been issued by the Clarendon Press in book form.* The whole lecture is one of the finest summaries of the present position with regard to poetry that we have had the pleasure of reading: scholarly without being abstruse, keenly critical without being pretentious. Professor Warren compared the great poets of the past, and notes the recurrence at intervals, roughly of about twenty-five years, of what might be termed a "poetic generation;" by this process of reasoning he infers the proximity of a new era of great achievement which may be equal in beauty and effect to the immortal Victorian age. "Despite the absence of conspicuous and household names of poets pure and simple," says the author, "I would confidently assert that we still have poets among us who have written pieces which have as good a chance of living in the anthologies of the future as many of the pieces which appear in the anthologies of the present." Professor Warren pointed out the great changes in nations and ideals which are taking place in every quarter of the globe at the present day, and suggested that poetry is even now beginning to deal with these new themes. Linking the subject of his lecture with the city of Oxford, he remarked that from time to time little circles appear in the University whose members are destined to have great influence upon the various matters they discuss. "Silently, stealthily, they come together, like fairy-rings in the night, sometimes only leaving a mysterious mark upon the morning grass, and afterwards melting away even as they came; sometimes growing into more lasting strength of flower and fruit."

Few clever men are without the gift for versification, but

* Oxford and Poetry in 1911. (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Professor Warren warned his audience not to imagine that such an accomplishment signified the possession of the Divine fire. At the same time he gave the excellent advice that such a gift should be cultivated as part of a literary and mental training. His address was pregnant with thought, and should be read and pondered by all who wish for a clever and interesting presentation of the case for poetry in this somewhat commercial age.

A JAPANESE ON WHISTLER

It is not only the Oriental conception to say that "yes" and "no" are, after all, the same thing; I often find such an assurance in the matter of art. Whistler, for instance. His art of "curious carving of nature and life" had been recognised from the beginning in England by the stronger word of flat denial; Ruskin was the greatest of his admirers. Whistler was clever almost to a fault, and cleverness in art as well as in literature was comparatively a new thing in England. When I say he was clever, I mean it in the sense our Hokusai was clever. His impressionism—Oh! what an arbitrary word!—was something of Hiroshige's; and again, his gracefulness might belong to Utamaro. I do never mean he was influenced by the Japanese artists—no, no; I do not mean it at all. I feel only glad to know that the best art always comes from Nowhere, and never carries a particular badge of East or West; it is a bit of Japanese vanity when we write Whistler down in parallel with our artists. As the question yet remains (perhaps for ever) to fix the final place for the colour-print artists in our art, we have the same question, we believe, on Whistler; and as we find many reasons to deny the title of greatness to the former, the latter, too, may not have been great. I know how charmed, and again bewildered, we are when we are alone with his work face to face, and we think him almost great; but we cannot help perceiving his smallness when we see his work side by side with the work of some greater artists. There is an artist who suddenly gains from being compared; Whistler, however, is rather sad in comparison. So it is with our artists of the Ukiyoye school—for instance, compare Hokusai (that magician of line and design) with Seshu, or even Okyo. I am told that Whistler's small physique—he hardly weighed more than 130lb.—was never noticed when he was alone; I think it was so with his art. I agree with Mr. George Moore, who said that Whistler might have been a greater artist if he had been bigger in physique; Mr. Moore says often clever things. To say he was small I do not mean to undervalue him: in fact, smallness or greatness has not much meaning. His being over-fastidious cannot be overlooked; his perfection in unfinishedness mostly betrays his temperament; he was one of the most studied artists. If it appeared his work was always done from inspiration, it is only that he proved the work which he executed at the odd moment, as we might say, when he least expected it. The remarkable part is that he was always ready for that moment; what energy, what persistence he had to grasp it!

I am told of his habitual indifference to time and place; not only in his personal action, also he made his dream of colour and rhythm at once soar out of them. He never copied Nature or eternity; what he represented on canvas was the very Nature and eternity themselves; it was a sad accident to let his picture bear a particular name of a place. While it does not look like the reality you and I think we see perhaps in Nature, it shows a sweeping ghostliness ageless and eternal. It is most interesting to read what he said before the Judge at the time of the Ruskin-Whistler case. He remarked:—"If it were called a view of Cremorne, it would certainly bring about nothing but disappointment on the part of the beholders. It is an artistic arrangement." Again, he said:—"To some it may represent all that is intended, to others it may represent nothing." That is the real point of his art. A desire and composition are merely a human creation that great Nature never thought of; as Nature never tells you where it was begun, how it was ended, what its idea and what its intention, so Whistler thought his pictures should be. It is perfectly clear to see why he was called a conceited and wilful impostor; but the abusers only exposed at the best their own knowledge, which is a lost thing in Art. What Whistler aimed at was imagination and impulse.

No artist when he is great can separate his personality rom his work; as Whistler's personality was unique, whether it was after study or not, so his art was; and we all see his personality behind his work. If you only see the surprise, mystification, confusion, and confounding in his art, I do not think you see the real Whistler at all. It appears, at the first glance, that he was always playing with his art and also with his friends, and he was so witty and combative; but he was at his heart of hearts most sincere and sad, again like our Hokusai. His strange aloofness in his art as well as in his personality may have been rooted in his Puritan blood; and his Puritanism was touched by the modern cynicism and alternately by the attractive cosmopolitanism; therefore he was both severe and delicate. I do not find a particular reason to call him eccentric, if not in the fact that he was proud in art, uncompromising in intention, eager in aim. If so, he was the most eccentric artist that ever lived.

As there are not two Hogarths, two Velazquez, there will be no other Whistler in the future; just one Whistler is indeed enough. He was his own rule to himself, not belonging to any school already in existence; the school which he established at once was extinguished with his death; that was good. I know that a great art of the world is a creation of prayer, and the great artist is always a sort of priest. But where Whistler lacked the sober reverence toward Nature and Life, he gained, on the other hand, a touch of democracy; it was he who brought art down to noble artisanship. And his democracy of art was saved from vulgarity by his Puritanic aloofness. It is too common to say that his art was a work of love; but with Whistler it was a true case. Whatever the people happened to say, he was the most enthusiastic admirer of his own work; where is any more strong supporter? And where is the other artist who adored his work of creation as he did? I think that it does little justice to call him a colourist. We have many Oriental artists who never use any other colour but black and grey; yet we call them true colourists. One must see beyond the colour itself, and feel the inner voice of symphony. The colour, I think, was for Whistler only a means to make his picture sing a living song; from such a sense, he was a great colourist. Indeed, he was. And it is almost foolish to attempt to examine the truth or reality of the colour on his canvas; though it may not be a true colour to you, surely it is a poetry or song, which you cannot deny.

YONE NOGUCHI.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE PALAIS-ROYAL—I.

BY MARC LOGÉ

WHEN Voltaire wrote—

> Il est une déesse inconstante, incommode,
> Bizarre dans ses goûts, folle en ses ornements.
> Qui paraît, fuit, revient, et naît en tous les temps, > Protée était son père, et son nom est la Mode—

he seems to have predicted how Dame Fashion was to treat

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

the beautiful palace of the Palais-Royal since its foundation until this day.

Built, or rather begun, by Richelieu, the Palais-Cardinal, as it was then called, was presented by the great Minister to Louis XIII. After this Sovereign's death, his widow, Anne of Austria, the Queen Regent, dwelt there with her two sons, Louis XIV. and the Duc d'Anjou, until the former's majority, when the Court returned to the Louvre. Amongst the most notable guests the Palais-Royal sheltered was Henrietta of France, who retired there during her widowhood. Then came the Revolution, with its train of riots, mobs, and tumults, of which many were witnessed by the Palais-Royal. During the Consulate and the Empire the galleries of the fine old palace were the meeting-places of Parisian fashionable life. The Merveilleuses and the Incroyables strutted vainly in its broad avenues; and it was there that between two campaigns Napoleon's bravest Generals trailed their long swords and twirled their conquering moustachios. Later the Palais-Royal was haunted by members of the fast set, and gambling dens were to be found in each of its houses. The scandal even became so great, that when Louis Philippe came to the throne he ordered that all the women living there should be expelled and the "tripots" closed. . . . Since then the old palace is silent and deserted; some children play in the beautiful garden, where Louis XIV. as a boy was wont to amuse himself; some tourists, guide-book in hand, pass through it, admiring the superb vistas of galleries and the fretted stonework, and each day at noon a small sun-cannon fires a shot which awakens the echoes of the silent archways, causing the quondam royal residence to arouse itself with a start from the dream of dusty neglect it has been indulging in for so many years.

One corner of the ancient palace, however, has still preserved some of the animation of bygone days: this is where the famous Théâtre du Palais-Royal has, since more than a century and a half, echoed with the laughter of delighted audiences. Unlike many other old Parisian playhouses, which change their style of spectacle several times a season, this theatre has been since its foundation consecrated almost exclusively to comedies and vaudevilles—the few melodramas produced there having been dismal failures.

The history of the theatre is both varied and amusing, and we will endeavour to relate it summarily according to the most reliable documents—some very little known—to be found on the subject. In 1753 the Duc d'Orléans had the whim of ordering a playhouse to be built, for his own private use and pleasure, at the northern angle of the Beaujolais Gallery, in the Palais-Royal. For thirty years this theatre remained closed to the public. But in 1784 there chanced to live in the Faubourg St. Antoine a wood-carver named Delomel, who employed his leisure hours in carving puppets about 3ft. high, many of which were portraits and sometimes caricatures of certain celebrities of the day. He carved the figure of Voltaire, which obtained a great success, for, though dead several years before, the "old invalid" of Ferney was still a great favourite with the Parisian population.

In the house inhabited by Delomel there dwelt also a tailor, Gardeur, who took pride and pleasure in dressing his neighbour's puppets after the latest fashions of the epoch, thus adding considerably to their value. Each noontide when there surged forth from all the "ateliers" swarms of workpeople hurrying to enjoy the hour or so of liberty granted them for their lunch, a crowd of gazers would assemble before Delomel's shop-window to admire his marionettes. It is, therefore, hardly surprising that when Jean Gardeur, the tailor's brother, came to Paris, and witnessed the popularity the little marionettes enjoyed, he should have had the idea of establishing a puppet-show on some Parisian stage. He confided his plan to Delomel, who approved of it, and they accordingly set out together in quest of a playhouse wherein to open their show. One day whilst wandering about the streets, they came upon the little theatre of the late Duc d'Orléans. They immediately decided that it exactly suited them, and started to form a company, which, after some preliminary negotiations, obtained from Monseigneur le Comte de Beaujolais, third son of the deceased duke, the authorisation to hire the theatre on payment of an annuity of 14,000 livres "plus 6,000 livres de pot de vin."* His Highness was, moreover, graciously pleased to allow Delomel and Gardeur to open their puppet-show under the quaint designation of "Théâtre des petits Comédiens de Son Altesse Sérénissime le Comte de Beaujolais."

As soon as the Théâtre Beaujolais, as it was then called, had opened its doors in 1784, all Paris thronged to see the little wooden actors, though the house was small, containing only eight hundred seats, the acoustics defective, and the stage far too tiny. Fashion imperiously declared that "the thing to do" was to see the marionettes, and all her followers meekly obeyed. Many authors, some of whom were quite well known, composed special plays for the puppets: operas, comic-operas, or vaudevilles with musical interludes, were acted with an untiring good humour by the "fantoccini," who, thanks to an ingenious contrivance of strings, gesticulated and mimicked their parts, while a real comedian or singer, hidden behind the scenes, spoke or sang in their stead. The only reproach made was that the strings managing the puppets were rather too apparent; but the audience readily forgave this, and wept at the sentimental tribulations of the heroine, or laughed at the jests of the card-board comic, with almost as much feeling and mirth as if the parts had been personified by living people.

THE LIMIT

By Hilaire Belloc

While the politicians are running a sort of race as to which shall promise the most in the way of costly political experiment, and while the undoubted and grave demands of defence are increasing, one most important element in the economic situation is not clearly defined. Such of our public men as appreciate it prefer, in the popular House at least, to leave it undiscussed. The middle classes instinctively feel its presence, but not in a manner which they can formulate or define. Yet it is the one factor which controls the whole business, and whose presence will make itself felt quite independently of the claims of politicians or of the desires of those whom they administrate. This element is the arithmetical one. There is a limit to what can be taken in direct taxation from a community, and we have reached the limit. There is a more elastic boundary, the field of indirect taxation; but to extend indirect taxation would be so opposed to the axioms of the Treasury that we may neglect the chances of such an extension altogether.

Of what nature is this limit to the yield of direct taxation, and why may we properly say that we have reached it? Save in the sophistries of theoretical economists, there exists a very sharp division between taxation and confiscation. It is more than a division; it is an antagonism. You cannot say that up to a certain amount a tax is non-confiscatory, and after that amount confiscatory. But you can say (and the common sense of the community vividly appreciates it) that in one type of political philosophy confiscation is the object of the tax-gatherer, and that in another taxation is his object. You can say that there is an attitude which regards the State's claim to a portion of the citizen's wealth as a claim necessary, but tending to dangerous excess, and requiring careful watching, and you can say that a precisely contrary attitude of mind exists which treats the State's claim as a convenient engine for impoverishing certain classes of the community to the advantage of the less fortunate, to the advantage of the State, or to no advantage at all, but to a mere waste.

* A livre used to be worth a little less than the franc of to-day.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In spite of all that has been said and written upon the enormous increase in expenditure (and consequently in taxation) since the South African War, it is not true to say that taxation has been up to now confiscatory in any strict sense of that word, save, of course, in the case of the Licensing Bill, which happily failed to become law, and in the case of the licensing clauses of the Budget, which most unfortunately have become law. In that particular case there was, of course, confiscation, and confiscation of the grossest kind. A group of politicians who happened to be in power deliberately impoverished one particular section of those whom they administrate in response to the demands of their paymasters; and a very ugly business the whole thing was. But with that exception taxation, though ruinously high, has not been strictly designed with the object of impoverishing or confiscating. In other words, taxation is still based upon the old theory.

Now so long as this theory obtains so long will there be a natural limit to direct taxation. There is no limit to pure confiscation. But to the demand which you can effectually make against a citizen on the plea of necessity, with apologies, as it were, and after direct or indirect negotiation, a fairly clear limit exists, set by the psychological and economic conditions of the community.

There are two main forms in which direct taxation is now levied for Imperial purposes upon the inhabitants of Great Britain—Death Duties and the Income-tax.

Neither of these can be materially increased in the future, and that for the following reasons.

The Death Duties, it is now generally appreciated, are beginning to trench upon capital. True, the capitalisation of wealth in this country goes on at a much faster rate than the dispersion of it through this channel. But still, to distribute capital at all is so dangerous a thing that there is a general consensus of opinion against the increase of this form of tax. Let it be remembered that the values taken are not transformed into permanent values. They do not secure for the State any fraction of the means of production. The State does not proceed with these great lumps of capital that are handed over to it to purchase railways or land. It dissipates these lumps of capital in consumption; and as the Death Duties have risen so has risen not the proportion of funded wealth owned by the State, but the number of officials whom the State must feed, house, and clothe.

That the Income-tax has reached its limit may be verified in more ways than one—the most curious, perhaps, is the "earned income" trick; it was clever and it has succeeded, but it has succeeded at a cost of exasperation which will make any addition to it exceedingly difficult to levy. The idea of the "earned income" trick was to get at the maximum taxable capacity of a class which could not be dealt with automatically.

Before the South African War the attitude of the officials was roughly this:—The great bulk of Income-tax was levied at source. It took the form of stopping so much out of dividends, officials' salaries, &c. The amount which was paid by the professional classes out of earnings usually irregular and uncertain was estimated on an easy basis; few questions were pressed, and the sum demanded did not, as a rule, strain the tax-payer. A rough estimate of the amount of income a man might be earning as judged by the house he lived in, and so forth, was made by the assessor's man. A very much smaller sum was then fixed in proportion to this supposed rate of living, and on that much smaller sum were professional men assessed and taxed. To increase as vastly as it has been increased the contribution of this section of the community, a method was imagined of offering them a dilemma—a set of alternatives was framed such that any attempt to escape from which ever might seem the worst course would compel a man to equal or greater evils under the other. This method, by the way, appears regularly in history whenever governments are pressed for money, and is one of the first systems of embarrassment. It will probably be used in the near future for the purpose of taking land; a man will very probably be asked to set his own rateable value, and will be liable to be taken at his word for purposes of public purchase. However that may be, the design of the "earned income" trick is only too clear. The assessors put down a very high sum—much more than a man can pay. It is to their personal advantage, of course, to make the sum as high as possible. On this high assumption they demand 1s. 2d. in the pound, or, to put it in terms of earnings, they ask for the earnings of three weeks.

The greater part of professional men cannot pay this, first because they are assessed far above their true standard, secondly because the demand for a lump sum of such magnitude is one that can with difficulty be met by any one who lives upon his earnings alone. Were you to go, for instance, to a skilled artisan earning £3 a week, and ask him for a £10 note, he would in the majority of cases be unable to pay it. The professional man, harassed in a similar degree, is told that he may get off with paying only about a fortnight's earnings instead of three weeks, on condition that he lays every detail of his private affairs, his loans, his mortgages, claims upon him of every kind, and all the forms in which his money comes to him as well, before a closely organised body of officials whose activities cover the whole country, and who are in correspondence with one another and with their common head.

If the poor fellow accepts this alternative it is not for him nor for the Court of Justice and the law to decide what part of the gross income is real and enjoyable income. He may have a motor-car which is an absolute necessity for his business; he may take journeys which are absolutely necessary for his business and which he would never dream of taking were he a man of means; there will be journeys he only takes because they will increase his professional income. He pays rent for a house which he would never think of affording himself if he were fortunate enough to possess a private income instead of having to produce all he spends. None of these items nor any of the hundred others will be considered. He will have to pay on what may be double, or more than double, his real power of economic enjoyment; and what is more, he is, after having made that choice and given in details of his private affairs, permanently in the hands of a machine which now knows all about him and can control all his estimates in the future.

The wise man will have nothing to do with such a system. He will accept, as the better of the two alternatives, the payment of the very large sum arbitrarily made under the first system rather than make a great body of commissioned officials his confidants in the most private affairs of life.

I have said that the Income-tax has reached its limit. The reason that it has reached a limit is largely that the exasperation caused by the method of its collection—precisely in the case of that class which writes, speaks and influences—has risen to the pitch we know.

Can the 1s. 2d. collected at source, the mass of the tax, be increased? Hardly in time of peace. The matter is, to some extent, one of negotiation. The politicians are not absolute masters—least of all are they masters of those great organised groups of wealth which stand behind each political party. The automatic collection of even 1s. 2d. in the pound is a strain. To attempt to increase it, for any length of time at least, will probably fail unless or until a theory and policy of confiscation is adopted.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is possible that we shall come to that. We may be driven to it by necessity. Our charges are increasing far more rapidly than our wealth as a nation. Our great rivals and competitors are increasing their wealth also far more rapidly than we are increasing ours. That is certainly true of France, Germany, and the United States. It is probably true of other countries as well.

We cannot yet count upon the prospect of proportional aid from the Colonies, and we may take it that the considerable new expenditure which every new social experiment or foreign threat increases cannot be met by contributions of this kind. Neither can it come, in the political circumstances of this country, from an increase of indirect taxation.

Had there been purchases of land by the State and endowment by the State wisely and in time, before our great industrial expansion took place, had an increment tax been devised before, and not at the close of, the growth of our great cities, such an endowment by the State and such an increment tax would have solved the problem. It is now too late. What, then, still remains? A loan.

The suggestion is an unpopular one. A leading statesman made it once in the course of the last few years, and his making it raised a little storm. But what else remains? The Press shirks the suggestion, and in general we all try to think as little about it as possible; the less we think with the more difficulty will a loan be avoided.

THE STORY OF A BOOK

II.—THE SLEEPY PUBLISHER

THE publisher to whom our author had confided his manuscript stood, like all publishers, at the very head of his profession. His business was conducted on sound conservative lines, which means that though he had regretfully abandoned the three-volume novel for the novel published at six shillings, he was not among the intrepid revolutionaries who were beginning to produce new fiction at a still lower price. Besides novels he published solid works of biography at thirty-one and six, art books at a guinea, travel books at fifteen shillings, flighty historical works at twelve-and-sixpence, and cheap editions of Montaigne's Essays and "Robinson Crusoe" at a shilling. Some idea of his business methods may be derived from the fact that it pleased him to reflect that all the other publishers were producing exactly the same books as he was. And though he would admit that the trade had been ruined by competition and the outrageous royalties demanded by successful authors, and, further, that he made a loss on every separate department of his business, in some mysterious fashion the business as a whole continued to pay him very well. He left the active part of the management to a confidential clerk, and contented himself with signing cheques and interviewing authors.

With such a publisher the fate of our author's book was never in doubt. If it was lacking in those qualities that might be expected to commend it to the reading public, it was conspicuously rich in those merits that determine the favourable judgment of publishers' readers. It was above all things a gentlemanly book, without violence and without eccentricities. It was carefully and grammatically written; but it had not that exotic literary flavour which is so tiresome on a long railway journey. It could be put into the hands of any schoolgirl, and at most would merely send her to sleep. The only thing that could be said against it was that the author's dread of inspiration had made it grievously dull, but it was the publisher's opinion that after a glut of sensational fiction the six-shilling public had come to regard dulness as the hall-mark of literary merit. He had no illusions as to its possible success, but, on the other hand, he knew that he could not lose any money on it, so he wrote a letter to the author inviting him to an interview.

As soon as he had read the letter the author told himself that he had been certain all along that his book would be accepted. Nevertheless, he went to the interview moved by certain emotional flutterings against which circumstance had guarded him ever since his boyhood. He found this mild excitation of the nervous system by no means unpleasant. It was like digesting a new and subtle liqueur that made him light-footed and tingled in the tips of his fingers. He recalled a phrase that had greatly pleased him in the early days of his novel. "As the sun colours flowers, so Art colours life." It seemed to him that this was beginning to come true, and that life was already presenting itself to him in a gayer, brighter dress. He reached the Publisher's office, therefore, in an unwontedly receptive mood, and was tremendously impressed by the rudeness of the clerks, who treated authors as mendicants and expressed their opinion of literature by handling books as if they were bundles of firewood.

The Publisher looked at him under heavy eyelids, recognised his position in the social scale, and reflected with satisfaction that his acquaintances could be relied on to purchase at least a hundred copies. The interview did not at all take the lines that the author in his innocence had expected, and in a surprisingly short space of time he found himself bowed out, with the duplicate of a contract in the pocket of his overcoat. In the outer office the confidential clerk took him in hand and led him to the door of an enormous cellar, lit by electricity and filled from one end to the other with bales and heaps of books. "Books!" said the confidental clerk with the smile of a gamekeeper displaying his hand-reared pheasants. "There are a great many," the author said timidly. "Of course, we do not keep our stock here," the clerk explained. "These are just samples." It was sometimes necessary to remind inexperienced writers that the publication of their first book was only a trivial incident in the history of a great publishing house. The author had a sad vision of his novel as a little brick in a monstrous pyramid built of books, and the clerk mentally decided that he was not the kind of man to turn up every day at the office to ask them how they were getting on.

The author was a little dazed when he emerged into the street and the sunshine. His book, which an hour before had seemed the most important thing in the world, had become almost insignificant in the light of that vast collection of printed matter, and in some subtle way he felt that he had dwindled with it. The publisher had praised it without enthusiasm and had not specified any of its merits; he had not even commented on his fantastic use of the colon. The author had lived with it now for many months—it had become a part of his personality, and he felt that he had betrayed himself in delivering it into the hands of strangers who could not understand it. He had the reticence of the well-bred Englishman, and though he told himself reassuringly that his novel in no way reflected his private life, he could not quite overcome the sentiment that it was a little vulgar to allow alien eyes to read the product of his most intimate thoughts. He had really been shocked at the matter-of-fact way in which every one at the office had spoken of his book, and the sight of all the other books with which it would soon be inextricably confused had emphasised the painful impression. This all seemed to rob the author's calling of its presumed distinction, and he looked at the men and women who passed him on the pavement, and wondered whether they too had written books.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This mood lasted for some weeks, at the end of which time he received the proofs, which he read and re-read with real pleasure before setting himself to correcting them with meticulous care. He performed this task with such conscientiousness, and made so many minor alterations—he changed most of those flighty colons to more conventional semicolons—that the confidential clerk swore terribly when he glanced at the proofs before handing them to a boy, with instructions to remove three-quarters of the offending emendations. A week or two later there happened one of those strange little incidents that make modern literary history. It was a bright, sunny afternoon; the publisher had been lunching with the star author of the firm, a novelist whose books were read wherever the British flag waved and there was a circulating library to distribute them, and now, in the warm twilight of the lowered blinds he was enjoying profound thoughts, delicately tinted by burgundy and old port. The shrewdest men make mistakes, and certainly it was hardly wise of the confidential clerk to choose this peaceful moment to speak about our author's book. "I suppose we shall print a thousand?" he said. "Five thousand!" ejaculated the publisher. What was he thinking about? Was he filling up an imaginary income-tax statement, or was he trying to estimate the number of butterflies that seemed to float in the amber shadows of the room? The clerk did not know. "I suppose you mean one thousand, sir?" he said gently. The publisher was now wide awake. He had lost all his butterflies, and he was not the man to allow himself to be sleepy in the afternoon. "I said five thousand!" The clerk bit his lip and left the room.

The author never heard of this brief dialogue; probably if he had been present he would have missed its significance. He would never have connected it with the flood of paragraphs that appeared in the Press announcing that the acumen of the publisher had discovered a new author of genius—paragraphs wherein he was compared with Dickens, Thackeray, Flaubert, Richardson, Sir Walter Besant, Thomas Browne, and the author of "An Englishwoman's Love-letters." As it was, it did not occur to him to wonder why the publisher should spend so much money on advertising a book of which he had seemed to have but a half-hearted appreciation. After all it was his book, and the author felt that it was only natural that as the hour of publication drew near the world of letters should show signs of a dignified excitement.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

A NEW ZEALAND SHEEP-DRIVE

By W. H. KOEBEL

IT is the hour when, according to the Maori, evil spirits walk abroad in the bush. If so, the perambulations of these unpleasant forces are utterly silent. Had you an ear that could drink in all the sound from a radius of a dozen miles, you would hear nothing beyond the occasional hoot of an owl, the dreamy ripple of the creeks, and a harsh intermittent groaning from the tops of the highest trees. Even this last noise is entirely unconnected with ghosts. The night airs are stirring a dead branch or two that have protruded above the sheltering curtain of the main verdure, and the great strips of hanging bark are creaking dully beneath their force.

If, too, you would mount that loftiest peak of all that sends its dark pinnacle upwards to divide the brilliant clusters of the stars, you would have the opportunity of surveying a swelling panorama of extraordinarily effective neutral tints. Uneven, deep black folds of forest, the clear-cut contours of the grasslands, the narrow gorges lost in gloom, the broader valleys lit up by the silver streams of their rivers: the whole mystery of the bush by night will reveal itself to the eyes that look down from that peak. But, unless you be bat or owl, I doubt if you would find the journey worth while. Certainly you would not were you long familiar with the land, and had you learned to consider its soil as the prosaic source of necessary bread and butter. The latter consideration will undoubtedly effect much of which mere sentiment is incapable. It is responsible even at this uncanny hour for illuminated windows in a small homestead, and for two rays of yellow light that strike outwards in a timid struggle with the night. They are daring and solitary beams: one might swear with safety that there are no others within a score of miles.

There is a stirring at the lonely spot that is quite incompatible with the hour. From the sheepyards come the uneasy trampling of thousands of hoofs, the hoarse coughing of the wethers that sounds with so human a note, the sighing rustle as the fleeces crush up against each other, and the occasional staccato bleat of discontent. In a neighbouring enclosure the horses wait in passive dejection. From the equine point of view it is a bleak place in which to be confined—a bare, hoof-worn spot innocent of a single projecting blade of grass. Restrained by the unwonted and unsympathetic rails, they have killed time for the greater part of the night as best they might. There was little else to do but to admire the beauty of the stars and the silver light that bathes the glades and open spaces—effects that naturally leave the animals profoundly unmoved.

It is difficult to cope with the dreamy spirit of the hour. Three men have emerged from the homestead now. The movements of the newcomers are unusually languid; their very spurs seem to clank in a subdued and minor key. Even the dogs are in a strangely silent mood. As the chains are loosened along the row of kennels there would in ordinary circumstances ensue a wild bounding of furry bodies and frenzied barks of joy. But all that is for the exhilarating glow of daylight. As it is, the dogs content themselves with a few vigorous shakes, and then, with an unusual display of decorum, follow in the footsteps of the men.

The gates of the sheepyards are opened. A stream of dim white backs surges out in the same mysterious and dreamy fashion that characterises all movement just now. The dogs stand sentinel on either hand; then, when the yards are emptied, they move forward by the side of the sheep. The procession has begun. The yellow light has died out in the windows of the homestead. All—save the intermittent glowing of three pipes—is neutral tinted again.

The grey mass of sheep, riders, and dogs rolls forward as relentlessly and as methodically as the waters of a river. All about it are the scents of the night, the cool odours of the leafage, and the warm pungency of the thudded earth. It is a very sober procession that wends its way along the track, now clear-cut and wondrously distinct in the broad, open light of the stars, now lost for a while in comparative darkness as the great trees bend over to shade the road. On those stretches where the way leads direct and unswerving the men nod drowsily in the saddle, and the dogs pace along in silence. It is only at those places where the track splits into two, or where the route hesitates in the midst of a wide, open space of land that the dull rhythmic patter of the hoofs is broken into by other noises. Then will sound a heavier beat as a rider gallops his horse the length of the long line, while the barking of the dogs breaks out sharply. But even this latter is effected more or less under protest, a circumstance that obtains during none of the more exhilarating hours.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The head of the long, fleecy procession is plunging now through the silver waters of a shallow creek, the splashing of the passage drowning the natural ripple of the waters and silencing the mournful call of a bush owl near by. After this the track mounts steadily, climbing upwards to cross a great barrier of peaks that rises directly to the front. A faint glow stains the sky for the first time just as the great company of the sheep begin the ascent. And as the four-footed toilers climb the mountain side, so the lights rise in the heavens. They are the usual flags of the dawn—faint rose, scarlet, and then a flame of gold. From the lofty spot to which the sheep have mounted now the ocean is visible at intervals between the peaks. It is from behind the radiant waters that the sun itself shoots upwards.

On the lofty peak here the change is abrupt and marvellous. A few moments ago all was grey and lifeless. No sooner have they climbed over the edge of the ocean than, without an instant's delay, the great beams have struck the warmth and fire of day into the landscape. The green of the grass and leaves, the grey of the rocks, the blue of the sky—every colour has been painted in in, the course of a second or two. Nor is the change confined only to inanimate nature. The moving flock responds in its own fashion to the sudden transformation of the scene. The white ranks move forward with a greater alacrity or hang back with a deeper obstinacy, just as the passing mood inspires them. The dogs become aggressive, and the shouts of the men echo along the mountain side. It is the first flower of the day, this, to be made the most of with the comfortable knowledge that a number of hours have already been stolen from the midsummer heat that is to come.

The gullies far beneath are still filled with the aftermath of night. About the trees in the hollows cling the early mists in great white sheets, and clouds, and feathery lakes, from out of which the mountain sides start upwards as though from spreading sheets of veritable water. It is another land down there—a dim and colourless shadow of these warm and brilliant regions above. Far away in the distance, beyond the crests of a lower range, is a vision of a plain, and of a shining blue band of sea that has eaten away a half-circle from the green land. To one side of this is a collection of tiny specks that you might cover with a lady's handkerchief. It is the township, infinitely minimised, clear as crystal though a score of miles distant. Sometime or other these hundreds of stout sheep will be there—when, exactly, it would be unwise to predict, since no element of the railway time-table is wont to enter into a sheep-drive.

Did the unfortunate creatures but know what lay before them their progress would undoubtedly be slower yet; for this is their last march in life. Their next journey will be in a linen shroud, in the dark and icy hold of a steamer bound for England. It is for this that they have plodded ghostlike through the cool night, and it is for this that they will rest at midday in the shade of the trees at some friendly halfway station. That a journey so full of glamour should end at the point of a butcher's knife! But they are more fortunate than some others, in that they have no inkling of what is in store. They are, moreover, only too anxious to co-operate heartily with their owners, for their bodies must be cherished in order that their epitaphs may be appreciative and laudatory.

So the long procession of fleeces, guarded by men and dogs, turns to begin its slow descent from the lofty peak. The distant township is no longer visible; nothing is to be seen but the green waves of verdure and the hawks floating above. Many hills and many valleys intervene between the spot and the coast. In the meanwhile, push on, for the heat is growing!

THE MAGAZINES

THE propinquity of the Coronation has cast its shadow over the Magazines, not altogether to their advantage. We yield to none in our loyalty, but Coronation odes, in verse and prose, not to speak of anecdotal reminiscences of his Majesty, and various other matter evoked by the event, are somewhat apt to weary the attention, especially if they are not confined to one magazine, but pervade them all. As might be expected, Mr. Alfred Noyes is well to the fore. His muse seems to be "a thing of modes and seasons." It certainly is very easily awoken to a thunder of rhetorical acclamation by every event that seems to be of political import, or that seems to serve an opportunity of seeking an official ear. In Blackwood he has a "Coronation Ode," strictly so-called. It compares unfavourably with Mr. William Watson's Ode on the Coronation of King Edward, and for the reason that such things when not done with a marmoreal dignity ring false. The same thing applies to his poem in the Fortnightly, entitled "A Salute from the Fleet." They both read much like exercises written for occasions, which is not good for Mr. Noyes, his muse, or his subject. Shoulder to shoulder with him, with a poem entitled "Coronal," is Mr. Walter Sichel in the latter magazine.

Among the Coronation articles it is difficult to choose. Their theme is not so much an event as a symbol, therefore it is not easy to evoke a great deal of variety out of it. The Fortnightly, for instance, devotes no less than three articles to the subject, in addition to the poems already mentioned. One under the pseudonym of "Index" treats of "His Majesty the King," and gives not less than justice to his subject. It is hard to extol our present Monarch in an article without seeming to disparage his father, so different are they in trend of thought and character. Nevertheless, "Index" achieves this end. Mr. Clement Harvard deals with the matter of "The Royal Prerogative," and Mr. Minto Johnston has a generally informative article on "The City of London and the Coronations." One of the most interesting of these articles, however, deals with "The Royal Crowns of England," and is to be found in the Windsor.

The English Review has succeeded in avoiding the subject altogether. For Yoshio Markino's altogether charming article on the "Queen of the John Bullesses" can scarcely be called a thing turned out to order. It is something much more than that: it is a genuine and delightful revelry of the soul. He writes, he claims, not as a foreigner. He says: "My flesh and bones are entirely made with the English substances by this time, so the medical science says, and my heart and brain are more Britonised by many kind-hearted John Bulless friends. Why, then, should I not be loyal to the Queen of the John Bullesses as much as the most loyal Britons? Do you say I am getting less patriotic to my own country? Nonsense! It makes me so grieved to think that there are many fools who misunderstand the word 'patriotic' as the 'fighting spirit' with the neighbouring country. Don't you know friend-making is far more patriotic?" Indeed, Mr. Markino cannot fail to be both patriotic and charming—if, in fact, these are not synonyms from one standpoint or another. His article makes delightful reading. In the same magazine Mr. Masefield has a poem called "Truth." Like so much of Mr. Masefield's work at the moment the matter in it cannot but compel, despite the fact that it is phrased with something too much of deliberation and consequent coldness. These attributes certainly cannot be claimed for any of Mr. Aleister Crowley's poems, nor for the poem that follows Mr. Masefield's with the title "On the Edge of the Desert." Being free from the echoes of Swinburne more than is usual with his work, this poem has more distinction in it.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The longest article in this magazine is one by Mr. John M. Robertson on "Form in Poetry." Mr. Robertson, as usual in matters æsthetic, deals with his subject with more erudition than insight. There is always something that catches the mind with mingled fear and irrision to see a logic-chopping intellect moving in the "realms of gold;" and it is such a spectacle that is to be witnessed in the present article. We expected, we must confess, and we expected eagerly, an essay that should deal with the real relation of the form of poetry to the matter that is given it to enshrine. This is a subject that needs and invites treatment. Therefore we were disappointed to find a general résumé of some heads of poetry (and not the chief heads either), from Piers Plowman to Mr. Herbert Trench. Having done so much, and having neglected Francis Thompson's contribution in the process, it is a little mystifying to be told at the end that the subject that we thought he intended to treat is "a matter for separate discussion." The article that will perhaps attract most attention is Mr. Walter Whitehead's on the perplexed question of Bone-setting. His article is, in fine, a vindication of Mr. H. A. Barker, and has been awakened by the late notorious case in which that gentleman was sued by a Mr. Thomas for the loss of his leg, with the damages placed at £5,000. It will be remembered that the case went nominally against Mr. Barker; but the damages given Mr. Thomas were an idle twenty guineas—a characteristic instance of the British jury's fear of positive verdicts. Mr. Whitehead's present article is rather concerned with the undoubted fact that had Mr. Barker been a regularly qualified man the action would never have been brought. It was so alleged by Mr. Carson for the defence. Certainly Mr. Whitehead's article will not make pleasant reading for the medical profession. Speaking with the full weight of his wide experience and high authority, he vindicates, not only Mr. Barker in the particular case, but his methods in general, adding that here again the profession has condemned itself in neglecting, and even opposing, a very noteworthy contribution to physiological science. In the same magazine Sir Gilbert Parker deals with the moot question of "Land Purchase and Land Banks;" and Mr. Frank Harris writes on "Morals," finding that this vexed question is, and must always be, a matter of mutation and personal appeal.

The Nineteenth Century is as learned as ever, and something heavy withal. It is surely more than a mere mistake to consider that only the weighty in a magazine matters. It is part of a false conception. Yet if the Nineteenth Century does not seek to achieve literary charm, it is generally unwise to neglect it on matters of passing interest. There are, for instance, two articles of some importance on the question of "Canada and American Reciprocity;" one giving the Canadian point of view, by the Hon. George E. Foster, and the other giving the English point of view, by Sir Roper Lethbridge. Both these gentlemen decide emphatically against the question of Reciprocity; while Mr. Foster declares that the whole matter was sprung unexpectedly on the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people by Mr. Fielding, that it is in flat contradiction to the aspirations of the Canadians themselves, to the policy of the past, to the national ideals for the future, and the immediate and robust desire of the moment. A careful reading of these articles, together with an intelligent appreciation of news that comes across the Atlantic from time to time, make it fairly obvious that the elections this year in Canada will be a very momentous and far-reaching matter. An article of considerable interest is "Sidelights on the National Economy and People of England," by Charles Morawitz, who is the Vienna Chairman of the Anglo-Austrian Bank. It steers its way between flattery and denunciation with considerable deftness. Herr Morawitz notices, what it is impossible for any man to avoid noticing, the extreme disparity between wealth and poverty throughout the country; and a matter that earns his censure is that curious thing, so characteristically British that no other country has an equivalent word for it, and which we must, therefore, always call "snobbery." Yet the writer many times in his article avows the fact that he is a foreigner: as when he speaks of "the way in which lunch is taken at Pimm's, Lyons', or at other restaurants in the City." The calm juxtaposition of Pimm's and Lyons' is very delightful. Mr. Maddock has also, in the Nineteenth Century, what purports to be an analysis of the "Facts at the Back of Unemployment," which, with the setting out of Mr. Snowden's speech on the subject, which he opposes, will drive the ordinary mind into the opinion that statistics must be the happy hunting-ground of debaters, since they can be brought to imply anything.

In the Cornhill Major MacMunn has an interesting, not to say a charming, article which he calls "The Key of all the Creeds." It is emphatically not an article that sets out to teach lessons; but in fact it does considerably more—it awakes innumerable thoughts. His picture of the old Sikh Subhadar, with a strong personality and a keen sense of responsibility turned absolutely to waste, makes one think. Any one who has lived in India will know that this is no isolated case. There is a deeply interesting set of articles just begun in the Century Magazine that starts well and promises better, by Signor Guglielmo Ferrero, entitled "The Woman of the Cæsars." Judging from the scope indicated in the initial numbers, it will set out the whole position of woman throughout the later stages of the Roman Republic and the Roman Empire. Two articles that defy examination, but that imperiously demand reading, so delightful are they, will be found in the Summer Term number of the Oxford and Cambridge Review. They are "The Pastoral Mood," by Professor Minchin, and "Putting Out," by Mr. E. S. Bates.

What will probably be considered the most noteworthy matter in all the magazines is a hitherto unpublished narrative by Thackeray on "Cockney Travels." Apparently it was written immediately before the "Irish Sketch-book" and "Cornhill to Cairo." It is only a fragment, though a lengthy fragment, and is in the true Thackerayan manner. Its appeal will be chiefly to the Thackeray enthusiast.

ART

AT MESSRS. McLEAN'S GALLERY

The two exhibitions now open at Messrs. McLean's Galleries in the Haymarket form a striking contrast to each other. Both the exhibitors are foreign artists. Mr. Wenceslas Radimsky works in a manner which in England is still comparatively new—it has been called Post-Impressionistic. The titles he gives to his subjects are such as "Le Soleil perce le brouillard," "Cérisiers en fleurs," "Temps orageux." He paints the passing aspects of Nature, and there is always motion—the glint of sunlight through leaves, the ripple of water. The other exhibition is of seventeen pictures by Mr. Tito Lessi, Professor of the Florence Academy. The writer of the introduction to the catalogue is at some pains to explain the standpoint of the artist who seems to invite comparison with Meissonier, and who aims at historical accuracy in the treatment of such literary subjects as "Galileo, who is blind, explaining his system to his son." The writer of this introduction is of opinion that the accepted proof of genius nowadays is "to daub with a startling audacity." It is unlikely that this is the first age in which such a proof has found favour with superficial critics, but it seems hardly worth consideration. Few would think of dissenting from the writer's praise of "absolute honesty," "indifference to all manual display but that of downright excellence in workmanship," and "patient and untiring search after perfection" as valuable qualities, if not essentials, of the painter's art. We may agree, too, in finding them all in Mr. Lessi's pictures. But it needs more than these things to make great works of art. Without attempting to compare the two artists, we may say that Mr. Radimsky's work embodies these principles no less than Mr. Lessi's, while that it will generally be found more startling is due simply to the fact that Mr. Radimsky's methods are something of a departure from conventional ideals, and that nothing at all like it is found in the exhibitions of the Royal Academy. As a practical proof, however, of the beginnings of our emancipation we regard it as significant that it is to Mr. Lessi's and not to Mr. Radimsky's catalogue that an explanatory introduction was deemed necessary.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MR. ROTHENSTEIN'S INDIAN DRAWINGS

Mr. H. G. Wells, in his introduction to the catalogue of Mr. William Rothenstein's Indian drawings, aptly expresses the feeling which one carries away from the exhibition when he says—without the slightest intention of being uncomplimentary, be it noted—that "the interest of the exhibition lies not in the shining quality of its art so much as in the admirable choice and poise of its subjects." Mr. Wells says further that he has sought and failed to obtain elsewhere a sense of the personalities of India's people. Mr. Rothenstein's sketches certainly succeed in giving this. Each one is a study of individual character, while over all there is the strange atmosphere of stillness which we feel to be expressive of the East—there is the race as well as the individual. The artist's methods of working—the curved, rather indeterminate lines, the somewhat vague shadows, and the general absence of scaffolding—are, of course, deliberate, and give a certain spontaneity and impressionism which suit the studies. Perhaps it was not altogether for the best that Mr. H. G. Wells wrote his introduction to the catalogue, since it has been so eagerly seized upon by the newspapers that Mr. Wells has tended to obscure Mr. Rothenstein. On the other hand, one is tempted to wonder whether without it we should all have been quite so enthusiastic. For ourselves we must confess that the drawings proved less of a revelation than Mr. Wells seems to have found them, and we are not at all sure that as much might not have been achieved by many another artist with a keen eye for character and a facility for expressing it in pencil. Possibly Mr. Rothenstein himself would not be the last to admit this. One critic we noticed rejoiced that the sketches were so unlike the startling costume and colour effects brought home by the average Indian tourist. The point, however, is that we do not expect to consider averages when we are considering Mr. Rothenstein.

There is some masterly drawing of architecture in the exhibition of Mr. Andrew F. Affleck's work now open at Messrs. Connell's Gallery in Bond-street. The artist does not always rise, however, to the level of "St. Requier', with—in addition to the architecture—its dexterously suggested figures, or of the lightly touched "Palazzo Ducale," or of the colour work in "Windmills, Dordrecht."

To the Rembrandt Gallery in Vigo-street all students of bird-life should go. There are fifty-five fine water-colour studies of birds by Mr. George E. Lodge, and the artist has added greatly to their charm and interest by his exquisite suggestions—the twigs and grasses in the "Robin" and the rushes in one of the "Mallard" sketches for instance—of the natural haunts of all his birds.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By Lancelot Lawton

THE CRISIS IN THE NEAR EAST

The problems in Morocco and in the Near East, which at constantly recurring intervals cause the peace of Europe to tremble in the balance, are again producing anxiety in the world of diplomacy. Spain has despatched a punitive expedition to Alcazar, ostensibly for the purpose of exacting compensation for the murder of a Spanish protégé, Ahmed Ben Malek; but it is transparent that a far deeper significance is to be attached to her action. The French Press rings with indignation at what it terms "a flagrant violation of treaty engagements," and the suggestion has already been made that a conference of the Powers should be immediately summoned to reconsider the new situation which has abruptly arisen out of the Spanish military measures. Both France and Spain persist in asserting that their mission in the Shereefian Empire is to suppress disorder, and in its place to substitute the benign influences of true civilisation. In spite of this laudable ambition, their activities repeatedly threaten consequences which are the reverse of their declared intentions.

The situation in the Near East has again developed alarming symptoms. When, some two years ago, Abdul Hamid was dethroned, the whole world rejoiced in that the atrocities which at his instigation were committed throughout the Ottoman Empire would no longer disgrace an age. The Young Turks came into power enthusiastically proclaiming that, regardless of racial or religious divisions, they would establish equality of treatment among the peoples of the Turkish Dominions, and the new régime was hailed by the Powers as offering very fair promise of a final and satisfactory solution of those dangerous problems which had incessantly menaced the concord of Europe. Unfortunately the high expectations that were entertained regarding the capacity, no less than the sincerity, of the Young Turks have not been borne out by events. To-day Albania is in a state of anarchy, and once more ominous clouds threaten a storm-centre in the Balkans. The origin of the trouble is to be found in the persistent persecution which has been inflicted upon the Catholic section of the Albanian peoples. In the time of Abdul Hamid the Albanians served the State as volunteers, and so much were their qualities appreciated by him that among the soldiery they were looked upon as pampered pets, yet withal fierce and loyal fighters. It is little wonder, therefore, that the introduction of conscription among them has proved unpopular, more especially in view of the harsh methods employed to enforce the operation of the law. At the same time, compulsory disarmament has been carried out. By an Albanian, himself accustomed from early boyhood to carry arms, and whose father and forefathers for many generations past have proudly borne them, an arbitrary measure of this kind is bitterly resented as an indignity both to his race and to his tradition.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Like Samson deprived of his locks, an Albanian without his beloved gun loses the emblem of his proud and glorious manhood.

In the schools the Turks have sought rigorously to suppress the native tongues. Moreover, they have set over the people Turkish Judges, who have administered to the strict letter laws to which the Albanians were complete strangers. In their attempts to stamp out the revolt that was the inevitable sequel to this calculated tyranny they have perpetrated hideous cruelties and nameless atrocities. In face of these damnatory circumstances the conclusion is compelled that barbarism is bred in the blood of the Turk, and that, although Abdul Hamid has been removed from the scene, his methods still prevail. The operations on the frontier have been made the occasion for aggressive demonstrations against Montenegro. An enormous force, computed, according to the latest testimony, to consist of at least eighty battalions with many guns, has been scattered throughout the border districts for the purpose of restoring order among the recalcitrant Ghegs and Christians of Malissya; and, not unnaturally, an uneasy feeling prevails in Cettigne that the concentration of an army of such large proportions can only have for its object some ulterior design. At the end of last month Russia demanded and received from Turkey a formal declaration of pacificatory intention towards Montenegro. The view is held in Constantinople that Montenegro is rendering active assistance to the insurgents. This misconception arises from the not extraordinary circumstance that Albanian Roman Catholics who reside in territories adjacent to the frontier give harbourage to refugee co-religionists, and consequently the maintenance of neutrality in the strict sense of the term becomes an extremely difficult task. Nor are the efforts of Montenegro in this connection assisted by the presence in large numbers of Turkish troops, or by the frequent recurrence of frontier incidents of a regrettable nature.

We cannot be surprised, therefore, that the relations between the two countries are strained, and that Montenegro has announced the abandonment of her intention to despatch a complimentary mission to greet the Sultan during his visit to Albania and Macedonia. Recent military operations have broken the back of organised resistance, driving the Malissori to the mountain fastness in close proximity to the frontier. In spite of the latest assurances from officially inspired sources in Constantinople, fears are still entertained lest in any further advance the Turks should pursue guerilla bands into Montenegrin territory, thus creating a situation which would instantly be regarded as casus belli. Only recently complications have been introduced by the sudden revolt of the Merdite tribe, who, in the course of a raid upon Alessio, succeeded in supplying themselves with large quantities of arms and ammunition from a blockade-running steamer which awaited their coming. This startling development has led to a public pronouncement of policy from Vienna. It should be explained that the Merdites are Roman Catholics who look to Austria-Hungary for some measure of protection. Of late the Austrians have been conducting an extensive educational propaganda in Albania, and in the course of their work have met with the obstruction of the Turks. Therefore they are in a position to be thoroughly well-informed as to the progress of events. The article which appeared in the officially inspired Fremdenblatt last Thursday, and which, by reason of its strong tone and the fact that it followed quickly upon the visit of King Ferdinand, created quite a stir, in referring to the Turkish campaign in Albania made use of such expressions as "unjust severity," "unbridled vigour," "bloody work," "the heavy hand," and "brutal repression." Finally the mouthpiece of the Vienna Government wound up by declaring, with unmistakable significance, that—

"Our sincere wish for the continued existence of European Turkey, and the special sympathies for the Albanian people of which the Monarchy has never made a secret, entitle our diplomacy to express its views upon a policy that has led to an untenable situation."

The warnings of the official organ have been followed by a conversation, much in the same sense, between Count Aehrenthal and the Turkish Ambassador, and rumours are in the air that in future Turkey will moderate her policy towards the Albanians; but as she has made similar promises before without fulfilling them it would be premature to consider the crisis at an end. Certain it is that neither Russia nor Austria will permit the present intolerable conditions to continue for long. In some quarters speculation is rife as to how far, if at all, these Powers are acting in concert. But Russia has not forgotten the annexation of Boznia and Herzegovina, and it may therefore safely be assumed that the protest of Austria, following as it did closely upon that of Russia, was merely a clever countermove. Both Powers are apparently in active competition for the favour of the Albanian and Montenegrin peoples, and upon the issue depends in no small measure the extent of their prestige in the Balkans. The whole situation is fraught with present and potential complications of first magnitude. Germany, whose commercial aims have led her to pose as the only disinterested friend possessed by Turkey, has been placed in a position of extreme delicacy in consequence of the vigorous action of Austria-Hungary, and she is now endeavouring to explain with a piety that is pitiful that, whatever policy any partner in the Triple Alliance may pursue towards Turkey, it has for its sole motive the welfare of Turkey. France is loyally supporting her ally, Russia; but, according to despatches from St. Petersburg, Great Britain is awaiting events before declaring herself.

It is devoutly to be hoped that, should the occasion demand strong action, there will be no repetition of our attitude over the Boznia-Herzegovina incident, when, so soon as Germany "fixed bayonets," we executed a volte face and cynically abandoned our friends. Another reverse of this kind would shatter for ever the Triple Entente and, in the rôle of perfidious Albion, Great Britain would once more be left in splendid, though very uncomfortable, isolation. Meanwhile the Ottoman Government blandly assures the world that, as the trouble is practically at an end, it may find itself in a position to make concessions to the Albanians. At the same time we read of fierce fighting on the frontier, and are told that already every available man in the Turkish Army has been sent forward and recruits brought from the interior, where the villages are deserted. Nor is Albania the only part of the Turkish Dominions where the outlook is serious. Incidents of a disquieting character are constantly occurring on the Bulgarian and Greek frontiers; unrest prevails in Macedonia; and the Cretan question is again the cause of anxiety. The surrounding Balkan States are armed to the teeth, and unless Turkey sets her house in order without delay the successor of Abdul Hamid may be the last of the Sultans.

THE FAILURE OF IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

As anticipated, the Imperial Conference has failed utterly to devise a scheme which would enable the Colonies to keep in close and constant touch with the Home Government. Mr. Harcourt's proposal for the creation of a Standing Committee met with considerable opposition, and was withdrawn. The opinion prevailed that no authority of this kind should be allowed to interrupt or supplant direct intercourse between the Dominions and the Colonial Office. Far from serving the cause of Imperial Unity, the deliberations of the Conference have only tended to reveal the dangerous elasticity of Imperial organisation. True, the delegates have been admitted to the inner secrets of High Diplomacy and of High Defence; but the declarations of Australia and of Canada that they must first approve of the cause before joining in a war with the enemies of Empire still stand recorded upon the pages of history. The comments of the Canadian Press come as a welcome relief to the separatist pronouncements of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The real sentiment of the Canadian people is properly represented by the Toronto Globe when it declares that "if Great Britain is at war the whole Empire is at war." It is comforting to reflect that in the hour of supreme crisis public opinion, and not the political opportunism of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, will decide the policy of Canada. Her people have not forgotten that the British fleet is maintained just as much for the protection of their shores as it is for those of the loneliest island within the world-wide limits of Empire, and that, should the honour of Canada ever be assailed, the British people would not adopt the non-committal attitude of investigating too deeply the primary causes before deciding to throw themselves heart and soul into the struggle. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has served the interests of his party, but he has betrayed the patriotism of his people. It is high time that he came out into the open and frankly confessed that he wishes to see the ties between Canada and the Mother Country severed once and for all. His astuteness as a politician and a diplomatist can no longer conceal his disaffection as a loyalist.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE CHURCH ARMY AND BOY EMIGRANTS

EVERY lad born in this country starts in life nowadays with the advantage of having passed through school. The education given in the public elementary schools is of course not in itself an equipment for life; it is merely the foundation upon which should be built up the training of the lad in the craft by which he is to win his livelihood. Real education for all of us begins when we leave school and take our place among our fellows, and begin to acquire the art and the skill by which we are to climb to prosperity and to success. But, in the case of tens of thousands of lads who yearly complete their course at public elementary schools, their education is cut short abruptly and automatically at the point at which it really ought to be beginning. A smart, active lad on leaving school can command relatively high wages as an errand-boy, newsboy, messenger-boy, or some similar occupation. Were he apprenticed to a trade he would for several years only earn wages of much lower amount. He would, it is true, at the same time be acquiring a profession for life, and might be reasonably secure of a livelihood. But in poverty-stricken households, and even in homes not truly poor, every shilling of immediate gain is held of importance. Thus the advantage of the moment carries the day, and the future is left to take care of itself.

That future in too many cases is of the gloomiest. All is well until the lad attains early manhood and looks, not unnaturally, to receive a man's wage. He probably intimates as much to his employer, only to learn that he is doing boy's work, and that if dissatisfied his place can be filled ten times over by lads as efficient as he. By this means the lad of seventeen or eighteen speedily finds himself out of work, without a trade, and with the further disadvantage of having forgotten what little he had learned when he left school at fourteen. His only chance of work is in casual and intermittent labour, in a market cruelly overstocked, and from such fitful jobs as come his way the fall to unemployment and soon to unemployability is swift and almost certain.

The Church Army, among its many philanthropic undertakings, has established a department whose endeavour it is to cut off this evil tendency at the root, in the first place by inducing parents to forego immediate profit for the sake of future advantage, and sometimes even helping them with the apprentice fees for binding their lads to proper trades; and when the evil has been done, as is too often the case, and the youth of eighteen finds himself stranded, the department seeks to remedy it by finding suitable employment, preferably on the land, for these potential derelicts. For many such lads emigration seems the best course, and the Church Army Boys' Aid and Emigration Department has already sent a considerable number of lads to Australia and to Canada, with very happy results.

In this connection it may be pointed out that the Church Army goes somewhat further than do the Boards of Guardians, who, under the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1850, are empowered to emigrate orphan or deserted children under the age of sixteen, subject to the regulation of the Local Government Board. The Church Army boy emigrants are cared for on the voyage by a Church Army officer, and are met on landing by the Society's representative, who arranges for their entry upon the employment which has been arranged for them beforehand, and who keeps a friendly eye on them until they are well settled.

As is well known, at the outset the immigration of boys of the class here dealt with was regarded in Canada and other Colonies with considerable suspicion. It was feared that lads of perhaps dissolute or unhealthy parentage might impair the morals of the native population, and even might become themselves a public charge. That this prejudice has almost entirely died out is evidenced by the fact that during last year the demand for such boy emigrants from Canadian employers alone was at least six times greater than the available supply.

By arrangement with the Australian Government authorities nominated passages have been secured for the Church Army lads, which reduces the expense to something like £5, apart, of course, from the cost of needful equipment. The Australian authorities, however, demand, not unreasonably, an equivalent for their concession. It is a condition of these cheap passages that the lads should have had at least two months' thorough training on a farm before sailing. To meet this demand the Society has established a farm colony at Hampstead Hall, an estate in Essex presented to the Church Army, and the results from this experimental training have been so satisfactory that the Society is now extending the Hall buildings (at a cost of over a thousand pounds) in such a way as to provide accommodation for thirty-five lads at a time. It is worthy of note that in this extension, which is in active progress, as much as is possible of the work of digging foundations, building, and carpentry is being done by the lads themselves.

Altogether this new enterprise of the Church Army, albeit still almost in infancy, is showing the most promising results. The news that comes home from the lads themselves is of the most cheering and satisfactory nature. Many of them are already the proud possessors of banking accounts, and a few have reported themselves as putting by nearly £2 per month—this, be it said, in a first year's sojourn in their land of adoption. Nor must it be feared that these lads, though they have left these shores, are lost to us. In thought they are still with us; in fact they are a gain to the Empire.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

BEAUTIFUL VARENNA

THERE is a lovely little Italian village clinging to the foot of the hillside where the waters of Lakes Como and Lecco meet, and where after a long, weary journey from England, leaving a dark, cold winter and a bleak, windy Spring behind you, forgetting all the million worries, responsibilities and conventions of life in the seething Metropolis of London, you awake the morning after your arrival a different being in another world. You look from your window upon green-grey mountains, still lightly sprinkled with snow, and Lake Como lies softly lapping their flowery, sloping base, its waters all dancing and blue in the illimitable sunshine that embraces you and all else beside. The scent of the wistaria greets your quickened senses, for the beautiful blue-purple bloom riots over everything it can reach, whether pergola, roof, or balcony. Dame Nature is in an extravagant mood on these splendid hillsides. Here, at last, she seems to have grown tired of withholding, and with a loosening grasp the whole lapful of her treasures falls at once in unimaginable beauty on this small and obscure spot, sweet Varenna, whose name ever haunts you like the name of a beautiful woman!

We must not, however, give Nature all the credit, for man has helped Nature well in contributing to Varenna's beauty. The village is good to look at, with its little grey church, whose tower is like a pale red nightcap, its clustering pink-roofed houses and lovely gardens at the lakeside.

The inhabitants, too, have a picturesque way with them; when the little Cardinal in purple came for a Confirmation every house in the narrow, cobble-stoned street hung its best out of the windows to welcome him, making a brilliant picture in colour. Here you saw only a poor, white cotton sheet and an old woman's worsted shawl, while there her richer neighbour displayed a many-hued quilt or even a piece of silk of rich green or purple shade.

The Cardinal, it seems, only comes about once in six years to Varenna, and the welcoming address hung at the outskirts of the village expressed itself in glowing terms of joy at the presence of "this tender father of his flock and their most beloved Cardinal, from the sons of exultant Varenna."

The poor little peasants of these Italian hillsides, although exceedingly picturesque, are still dirty, badly educated, and crushed by taxation. What wonder is it that now, as in past centuries, they still try to escape from the tyranny of their lives? Only instead of flying to the mountains, to be brought back in chains by their Roman masters, they emigrate in hundreds, and only return to their country when they have made enough to keep themselves there in comparative comfort.

It is an interesting psychological problem how these dirty, thriftless, ignorant peasants transform themselves into hard-working, law-abiding citizens of the United States merely by landing on those Republican shores. However, no one comes to Varenna to indulge in the solving of problems; the joy of the birds, the flowers, and all the perfection of Spring in its full beauty, the absence of hurry and worry, are enough to satisfy all the requirements of any ordinary mortal capable of loving the simple but profoundly marvellous beauties of Nature at her very best.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15 Copthall Avenue, E.C.

I AM unable to understand why the Stock Exchange attempted to make light of the Birkbeck Bank failure. Admittedly almost eight millions of money is immediately involved, and admittedly about two millions is lost. The mere loss of such a sum is serious, but what is much more serious is the blow to credit. The Birkbeck has always been considered a thoroughly sound concern. People to-day sneer at its management, but little more than six months ago the Bank of England came forward and lent the Society all the money it needed. It would not have done this had there been the least question as to the honesty and integrity of the directors and managers. The Bank of England supported the Birkbeck because it had solid assets of the highest class. That those assets have depreciated to such an extent as to compel the Bank to close its doors is a misfortune for which the Bank is not to blame. Much as I mislike the Socialist policy of the present day, I cannot place the failure to the discredit of Mr. Lloyd George, as some newspapers have done. Socialism is in the air. Its definite aim is the destruction of accumulated capital. Gilt-edged securities represent credit, which is accumulated capital in another guise. They have depreciated under the attacks of Socialism, and they will continue to depreciate as long as the politician attempts to win votes by promising gigantic armaments to the jingoes or gigantic doles to the working classes. Extravagant expenditure is a concomitant of Socialism. "The State pays; therefore you may spend what you like," says the politician. But the more money you spend the lower will fall the credit of the nation. The Birkbeck has been honestly managed, and is being honestly wound up now that the Board see that it can no longer pay 20s. in the pound. But the lessons of the failure will have a most subduing effect upon the Stock Markets. We must not expect any resumption of the boom for some months to come. The Joseph Lyons issue of 6 per cent. preference shares came as a surprise to those who do not understand that the growth of this huge business calls for yearly increases of capital. The concern has been splendidly managed and well financed, with the one solitary exception of one issue of bonus shares, and the present issue is a reasonable industrial speculation.

Canadian issues come out each day, and a serious crisis is gathering in the Dominion. Many of the offers are perfectly impudent, as, for example, the E. H. Heaps and Co. prospectus, which asks us to subscribe for £300,000 Five per Cent. Bonds, but does not tell us who purchased the bonds, gives no valuation of the assets, or idea of the profits other than that contained in a letter from Mr. Heaps. No sane person could possibly will his money upon such a prospectus unless he knew Vancouver and the whole past history of the Heaps business. The Canadian financier should understand that there are definite rules that govern the placing of capital in all large Continental centres, including London. Unless Canada complies with these rules, she must expect to get the cold shoulder. The British Empire Trust and Sir William Mackenzie figure in a prospectus of the Toronto Suburban Railway which is vague upon certain very important points. But the name of Sir William Mackenzie will probably carry the issue to a happy conclusion. Pearson Hugginson is a small affair, and will only interest local people. It is not big enough to command a London market, and for this reason should be left alone.

MONEY cannot now become cheaper, for, though the Birkbeck depositors will probably pay most of their money into other banks, some hoarding will ensue—at any rate for a few months. The American market grows so rapidly that New York will soon begin to withdraw her money from this side. We may get a little more gold from France, but neither Paris nor Cairo will send much. The Bank Rate is now not likely to fall, and, indeed, might conceivably be put up to 3½ per cent.—at any rate for a few weeks.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

FOREIGNERS are not likely to be affected by the events of last week. Paris really rules this market, and she will keep her securities steady. Russian industrials are not dealt in here, but if they should collapse the fall will react upon London. Perus still continue weak, but Russian bonds are kept steady.

HOME RAILS.—The Birkbeck was, of course, a large holder of home railway stocks, and the block pawned with the Bank of England will certainly be liquidated as soon as possible. This will continue to make the market weak, and those who have money to invest will probably have an excellent chance of buying the best gilt-edged railway shares at prices but a little higher than those ruling a year ago. For example, Great Westerns stood round about 125 twelve months back, and at the time of writing they can be picked up at 127½. Lancashire and Yorkshire were quoted 91 in June, 1910, and they are now to be purchased at 98. They are cheap. We must remember that all the railways are doing excellently, and that traffics will continue to be good all through the summer. England is thronged with visitors, who will spend money, and the railways must benefit. Therefore I advise investors to watch this market, and buy on any important reaction.

YANKEES grow stronger and more confident each week. Much as the great bankers desire to keep speculations in check, they are now afraid to sell. It is most important for them to keep their lines supplied with money, and they are busy placing bonds and short-dated notes. All the banks now make most of their money out of such issues, and each year the Wall Street financier grows richer and more conservative. The old-fashioned methods are dying out. Business in the States is much more honest than it used to be in the old days. Even the defeat of Kuhn Loeb was taken quite kindly. Such an incident ten years ago would have produced a serious feud. To-day it passes away almost unnoticed. I think we shall see higher prices all round in the Yankee market.

RUBBER shares do not improve, and unless the speculators can push up the price of the raw material I see no future in this market. Dividends for 1911 must fall very considerably, and many of the smaller and less carefully-managed plantations will find great difficulty in financing themselves. The Singapore people complain that the companies are spending too much money upon extensions. Certainly these are not the days to increase the planting area. But Boards with over-capitalised concerns want to reduce the capitalisation per acre and plant up big blocks. If rubber fell to 2s. 6d. a pound they would be in a serious position, at any rate until their trees came into bearing. No one should buy rubber shares to-day, for they will be able to get in much cheaper within the next few months.

OIL.—The promoters seem to have no luck. An attack is being made upon the Galician Oilfields, which it is said are giving out. This is one of those dangers that every oilfield must face. Oil, like coal, has only a definite life, and the more you pump the less you have to pump. The Kim people are also in trouble, as was to be expected from such an over-capitalised concern. But it is honestly run, and, in my opinion, the Directors should write down the capital one-half, when they could easily pay dividends.

KAFFIRS gave us a record for the month of May, but it did not help the market, which remains lifeless. The Labour trouble still frightens the investor, and I see no immediate future in Kaffirs.

RHODESIANS are almost as flat as their sister South Africans. It is quite clear that the public does not want to buy mining shares. The public feel that they are "out of it." All good news is acted upon by insiders, and all bad news is kept back till the insiders have been able to sell. This is not reassuring.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

BERNARD SHAW AT CAMBRIDGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Ogden has sufficiently shown in his letter that Mr. Shaw is neither an agnostic nor a materialist, that in fact he is a mystic, attacking the opponents of religion and declaring his admiration for the share of Christ in working out the Ideal of God. Mr. Cowper has attempted no explanation or justification of his statements, nor has he withdrawn them. But with a curious consistency (?) he now says that Mr. Shaw's address might have been delivered by the Reverend Doctor Dryasdust. A certain prominent heretic (who by the way is a scholar with a world-wide reputation) did object to Mr. Shaw's use of "the unpleasant word God." Mr. Shaw's reply was most impressive to all, and startling to many of his hearers. It was a clear and impassioned expression of his absolute belief in God. It is surely unfair, even in theological controversy, to saddle the speaker with all the opinions of every person in his audience, particularly those which he quite clearly repudiates.

The whole tone of Mr. Cowper's two articles, violent abuse, without an iota of argument or the least attempt to understand, is unworthy of THE ACADEMY, and still more of the seriousness of the subject. THE ACADEMY surely ought to recognise that Mr. Shaw has spent the whole of his life in endeavouring to save "the individual soul and the body politic from going down to perdition." Any one is, of course, at liberty to think Mr. Shaw's teaching as a matter of fact tends downwards, and, if he thinks so, should attempt to refute it by argument and a teaching of the opposite. But there are many quite orthodox Christians who admit that much can be learnt from such plays as "Widowers' Houses," "Mrs. Warren's Profession," and "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnett," and even such lectures as that recently delivered in Cambridge.

It is ridiculous to say that a meeting of a private society to which admission was by ticket is "a foisting by an itinerant lecturer on willing and unwilling listeners to undermine conviction and to sap the centuries-old foundation of civilised communion." But, again, let Mr. Cowper consider what the great religious teachers (more emphatically than any others Christ Himself) have always done. Surely their whole object has always been "to undermine conviction and to sap the centuries-old foundation of civilised communion."

It is surely quite natural that the upholders of Socialism should use the Christian religion, as far as its tenets appear to conduce to that end, and attack it where it seems to differ. Tories, Liberals, Radicals, vegetarians, and anti-vaccinators all do the same, except that, as a rule, they are too diplomatic to point out where Christianity does not support them.

In conclusion, I agree fully with Mr. Cowper "that, publication having occurred, we are entitled to comment on signs of the times which are of national and individual moment," and it is because Mr. Shaw's lecture and the audience that listened to it seem to me signs of the times of national and individual moment that I expect comment, not abuse and misrepresentation.—Believe me, yours, &c.,

AUSTIN H. JOHNSON.

"CONTEMPORARY BELGIAN POETRY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have a prurient mind. The passages most interesting to me in the latest volume of the "Canterbury Poets" series are those that your reviewer says are "not for the young." At the same time I am a poet and I have taste, and I affirm (a conclusion with which your reviewer in effect agrees) that although the translator just escapes being a poet, he has done his work with considerable art—it is much better done, in fact, than is usual in translations. Why then, as the publisher of the book asks pertinently, "fear for the young"? The justification of subject-matter lies in form—in the way it is treated. The critics' sole duty is with that treatment. The sooner they understand that art is one thing and morality another the sooner shall we have another Renaissance in England. In the meantime they may be stimulated to thought upon this subject by Wilde's "The Soul of Man" and Swinburne's book on Blake.

Another difficulty is with the publishers—of whom it is fair to state that the Walter Scott Company is one of the most courageous. You cannot expect either these or editors to risk imprisonment. And as for the artists themselves they know when their work is good, and that if good it will live in spite of the fluctuations of opinion and public hostility and ignorance of what is best. The desire for immediate recognition is a vanity upon which no one need waste a great amount of pity. Being human is a difficult business, but there is a joy in creation that atones for the general disinclination to indulge the creator in his desires.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Finally, apart from the fact that all's well with the world, encouraged by Mr. Crowest's letter, I will bet him a dinner, to be held somewhere between London and Felling-on-Tyne, that he will not publish some poems that are as good of their kind as anything since Keats. I hasten to add that they are not my own, though for Mr. Crowest's consideration I may also add that I too have my share of "the last infirmity of noble minds."

Yours faithfully,

H. SAVAGE.

45, Lambton Road, Wimbledon, S.W.

SIR,—Will you allow me to make an original interpretation of what, in your weekly comments, you term a "revolt" from early and mid-Victorian prudery? If, for instance, such a revolt exists, then I would venture to say that it is a revolt—and a very dangerous revolt too—from Man's innate sense of purity and nobility rather than from any periodical variety of comfortable "properness" in his manners and customs. Middle-class morality, which has been so aptly defined as the "prunes and prisms" order, and which sprang out of the homely rule (a rule dispensed under prolonged retirement) of the Victorian régime, has assumed democratic proportions; so that what was originally real and true sentiment (the sanctified devotion of a bereaved and reigning Sovereign) has, by a process of national evolution, become falsified. It is useless to pretend that a democracy possesses any other ground of sentiment than an impulsive ground—a ground which is an ordinary or brute ground—a form of sentiment which feeds class hatred and every other kind of national evil.

Yet it is a fact that not only our politics, but our religion, morality, and art also are at the present time ordered upon such a blind, irresponsible, and neurotic basis. Indeed, everything is now freely exploited (as though freedom can have anything in common with that which makes for restriction) to meet the false sentiments of Demos.

Let us go on with these "concessions to Mrs. Grundy," and not only government, morality, religion, and art, but every other thing which tends towards the creation of an ideal order of life will soon become extinct, at least as far as this country is concerned.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

SIR,—The two letters you publish to-day with reference to my review of this anthology call perhaps for a word in answer, though to some extent they may be said to answer one another. I can only sympathise with Professor Bithell for the treatment that his book has received at the hands of the publisher. A little carelessly, perhaps, I assumed that the omissions, some of which I noticed, were due to limitations of space rather than to the prudish blue pencil of the censor. Yet it seems that I was not unjust in crediting the translator with those qualities of good sense and courage of which his book has only been vicariously deprived.

Mr. Crowest's letter is insincere. He accompanies a plea for freedom in art with the admission that he has mutilated masterpieces by Belgian poets in order to satisfy a class of critic that he professes to despise. In the result he has failed from either standpoint; he has given satisfaction neither to the lover of outspoken art nor to Mrs. Grundy. His statue flaunts a costume so inadequate that, in the first place, I did not know that it was there; and, now that it has been pointed out to me, it seems to me that it serves only to create an atmosphere of suggestiveness. Unlike other volumes in the same series, "Contemporary Belgian Poetry" could not be included in a school library. It was for this reason alone that I commented on its outspokenness in terms that would not possibly be construed as condemnatory.

Personally I am in favour of complete freedom of speech for serious artists, but I confess that such a letter as Mr. Crowest's, revealing as it does the unpleasant commercial aspect of this freedom, gives me pause. The manner in which he refers to a forthcoming anthology of contemporary French poetry seems to me to admit of but one explanation. If he were moved by a sincere feeling for art he would have published Professor Bithell's translations without expurgation; if, on the other hand, he has accepted the conventional standard of reticence, he should have omitted a great deal more than he has. In compromising he lays himself open to the criticism of artists and moralists alike.—Yours faithfully,

R. M.

Brussels, June 10th, 1911.

[The editorial view on this subject was stated in the third note in last week's issue of THE ACADEMY under the heading of "Review of the Week."]

"EXPURGATED EDITIONS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The expurgation from literary works of sentences, phrases, or words deemed by certain persons to be actually or potentially offensive or dangerous to certain others is utterly without justification. It cannot be defended on æsthetic grounds, nor can it be shown to serve any reasonable ethic purpose. On the contrary, the practice has led to worse evils than those which it seeks to suppress.

It is indefensibly arrogant in any one to decide for the public what shall be deemed good and what evil in an unpublished book. Expurgation before publication by any one but the author is grossly dishonest and gratuitously insulting. What an author has written for the world to read should be given to the world as it left his pen, and not in the garbled transcription of some priggish zealot who is afraid to call even his legs by their right name. The appearance of a mutilated edition at once creates a demand for those which a certain class of publishers advertise, with subtle suggestiveness, as "complete and unabridged" or "full and unexpurgated"—in fact, the word unexpurgated is taken by certain of the prurient to indicate that the edition so described contains something more highly savoured than the original version; and the publisher, knowing this, accordingly charges a higher price.

Much is written about the protection of the morals of the young and innocent, and in their fussy solicitude many purblind disciples of the infamous Bowdler vainly strive, with their fatuous "Thus far and no farther!" to check the irresistible tide of experience. Their efforts, like those of all unenlightened bunglers, lead only to disaster.

With regard to books of a kind calculated to appeal only to special and restricted classes of readers nothing need be said. Anthropological treatises, and works dealing with what, absurdly enough, we agree to call "forbidden" topics, are never likely to reach the general public. More is the pity. Translations, whether of the classics or of contemporary Continental work, have been generally supervised, and such passages in the originals as promised offence to the Mrs. Grundy of theory have been perverted or omitted with appalling dishonesty. The truth, which ought to be patent to all, that nothing could well be more suggestive than a row of dots, escapes the pathetically misguided purist.

Of native English writings those which most frequently have suffered from the activities of the expurgator are plays and poems. From the notorious "Family Shakespeare" to the long-suffering efforts of the writer of lyrics for music, our literature has many instances of cruel usage at the hands of the man with the muck-rake. A lamentable record which makes one ready to echo the voice of the victim who in his agony exclaimed: "To the pure nothing is pure!" Surely total suppression were preferable to indecent nosings of the Bowdler kind.

It is true that some among us have succeeded in casting off the patched mantle of hypocrisy which was such an important item in the intellectual wardrobe of all but the very best of Victorian readers, and for this achievement our children will thank us; but because for a moment we feel uncomfortably clean and free, in the name of all light and sanity let us not be frightened into hiding ourselves behind the fig-leaf aprons designed for us by the mentally scrofulous and the spiritually unclean.

Your obedient servant,

D. DONALDSON.

196, Strand, W.C.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

BOOKS RECEIVED

THEOLOGY

Tradition and Reason, being a Reply to Miss Harrison's Pamphlet entitled Heresy and Humanity. By Edward Gordon Selwyn. Bowes and Bowes, Cambridge. 3d. net.

The Messages to the Seven Churches. Lectures by T. Herbert Bindley, D.D. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.

The Story of the English Bible. By the Rev. G. Margoliouth, M.A Burnside. 4d. net.

The Religious Experience of the Roman People, from the Earliest Times to the Age of Augustus. The Gifford Lectures for 1909-10 delivered in Edinburgh by W. Warde Fowler, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.

The Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount. By Gerald Friedlander. George Routledge and Sons. 4s. 6d. net.

Stepping Stones to Heaven. Daily Prayers for Boys and Girls. A. R. Mowbray and Co. 6d. net.

Women in the Ministry. By Hatty Baker. C. W. Daniel. 6d. net.

Theosophy. A Paper read before the Victoria Institute by the Rev. J. J. B. Coles. The Victoria Institute.

The Problem of Deuteronomy. By the Rev. J. S. Griffiths. S.P.C.K. 2s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Oxford and Poetry in 1911. An Inaugural Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre on June 2nd, 1911. By T. Herbert Warren, M.A. The Clarendon Press, Oxford. 1s. net.

The Campaigns and History of the Royal Irish Regiment from 1684 to 1902. By Lieutenant-Colonel G. le M. Gretton. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans of Battlefields. W. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.

Das Buchwesen im Altertum und im Byzantinischen Mittelalter. By V. Gardthausen. Illustrated. Veit and Co., Leipzig. 8 marks.

The Church of the Knights Templars in London. A Description of the Fabric and its Contents, with a Short History of the Order. By George Worley. Illustrated. G. Bell and Sons. 1s. 6d. net.

Notes on the Temple Organ. By the late Edmund Macrory, Q.C. Illustrated. Third Edition. By M. Muir Mackenzie. G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

Silhouettes Anglaises. By René Puaux. Preface by Grosclaude. Nilsson and Co., London. Librairie des Annales Politiques et Littéraires, Paris. 3f. 50c.

Papua: a Handbook to its History, Inhabitants, Physical Features, and Resources, &c. Compiled from Government Records and other Sources. By W. Charles Pritchard, M.A. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS

A Bibliography of Sheffield and Vicinity, (Section I., to the End of 1700.) By W. T. Freemantle. Illustrated. Pawson and Brailsford, Sheffield. 10s. 6d.

The West Country: Somerset, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall. (Homeland Reference Books, No. 4.) Illustrated. Frederick Warne and Co. 1s. net.

VERSE

Coronation Poem, and Love-Songs. By K. H. D. Cecil. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Brocade. Sonnets by Elsa Lorraine. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 2s. 6d. net.

Petals in the Wind: Verses of a Persifleuse. By Helen Jerome. Thomas C. Lothian, Melbourne. 1s. net.

Ephemerides. Arthur L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net.

More Peers. Verses by H. Belloc. Pictures by B. T. B. Stephen Swift. 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION

The Poet's Curse. By M. Y. Halidom. Greening and Co. 6s.

The Ninth Duchess. By Gurner Gillman. Greening and Co. 6s.

Four Millions a Year. By Colin Collins. Greening and Co. 6s.

PERIODICALS

Punch, Coronation No.; The Wednesday Review; The Bookseller; M.A.B.; The Bodleian; The Century Magazine, Anglo-American No.; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; La Grande Revue; Revue Bleue; Tourist Magazine, N.Y.; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Publishers' Circular; Night and Day; The Idler; Cambridge University Reporter.

By Special Appointment to  His Majesty the King.

MACKENZIE & MONCUR, LTD.,

Heating, Ventilating, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineers and Ironfounders, and Hothouse Builders.

HOUSE WARMING.

We are specialists in Warming Apparatus for Mansion Houses, Villas, &c., and we design and fit up complete apparatus in any part of the country, devoting particular attention to its introduction with the least disturbance and inconvenience. By our system a healthful, summer-like temperature can be maintained in all weathers with the minimum of labour and expense. Schemes and estimates prepared from Architect's plans. Surveys by arrangement. See our list of recent Heating, Electrical, and similar Egineering Contracts.

LONDON OFFICE— 8, Camden Road, N.W.

GLASGOW— 121, St. Vincent Street.

EDINBURGH (Registered Office & Works)— Balcarres Street, Morningside.

Telegrams—"Treibhaus, London," and "Hothouse, Edinburgh."

THE CHURCH ARMY

Pleads earnestly for

CORONATION GIFTS

in aid of its extensive Work.

LABOUR HOMES throughout the land for reclamation of criminals, tramps, loafers, and social wreckage generally, of both sexes.

FARM COLONY. Homes for Youths. 50 per cent. gain a FRESH START IN LIFE.

EMIGRATION for Men, Families, and Lads.

Aid for respectable UNEMPLOYED by provision of work.

FRESH AIR HOMES for Mothers and Children stifling in slums.

LEAGUE OF FRIENDS OF THE POOR, for personal service, by those having some leisure, to distressed families.

MANY OTHER BRANCHES, including widely extended MISSION WORK. 67 Mission Vans constantly perambulating the country districts on invitation of Clergy. Missions in Prisons, Workhouses, and Slums.

URGENTLY NEEDED:—Funds; Old Clothes for Men, Women, and Children; Orders for Firewood (3s. 6d. per 100 bundles); Needlework and Laundry-work; Waste Paper and Rags for sorting.

Cheques, &c., crossed "Barclays a/c Church Army," payable to Prebendary CARLILL, Hon. Chief Secretary; or Mr. W. F. HAMILTON, K.C., Hon. Treasurer, Headquarters, 55, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W. Telephone: Paddington 3440.

Visitors and Inquiries Welcomed.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash. Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During July & August.	Southampton, Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ACADEMY
AND LITERATURE

No. 2042 [Registered as a Newspaper.] JUNE 24, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.
Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

Works: TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Offices: 20, CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, W.

SCOTLAND:—Middleton & Townsend, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—The Hollingdrake Automobile Co., Stockport. SOUTH WALES:—Grosen Acb, Ltd., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—Murray Aunger, Ltd., Adelaide, S.A. Moulder Brothers, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD,

Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest Referenees. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:

ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE. POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,

30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

CITY LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED
6, PAUL STREET, FINSBURY, LONDON, E.C.,
Direct attention to their famous
IDEAL POLICY,
combining House Purchase with Life Assurance. Guaranteed Loan, Cash Surrender and Paid-up Values endorsed on every policy issued.
Prospectus Post Free.
Agents wanted. Excellent prospects.
M. GREGORY, Managing Director.

The Ideal Writing fluid. Far superior to all the old-fashioned Inks. Try it in your Fountain Pen.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL. — An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions. — For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

Catalogue No. 378.

JUNE SUPPLEMENT TO GLAISHER'S CATALOGUE
Of Popular and Attractive Books
at Cheap Remainder Prices.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON,
(and at 14, George Street, Croydon).
The books are on view at both addresses.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Bookfinder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

THE PROGRESS BOOK: an Illustrated Register of the Development of a Child from Birth until Coming of Age. By J. J. PILLEY, Ph.D.—London: The Leadenhall Press, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. One Shilling and Sixpence.

THE JUNE

BOOK MONTHLY

is a Good Number for the Coronation and it costs 6d.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Talk of a Literary Sort which you may Pass Round the Coronation Dinner-table.

GENTLEMEN! THE LADIES! What Every Woman Likes in the Novels she Reads.—By Amy Croft.

WHAT THE CITY MAN READS. A Passing Study in Newspapers, Books and Mixed Human Nature.—By George Sampson.

A SONG OF THE SHIRT. On the Note "Why dont Working Women Read More?"—By Priscilla E. Moulder.

THE WILL AND THE WAY. Strange Things about the Last Testaments of Notable Authors.—By W. Bailey Kempling.

A LONDON LETTER. A Salt Sea Voyage and some Bookish Discoveries.—By the Editor.

COPYRIGHT—AND WRONG. New Laws in the Making and a Dispatch from Canada.

CORONATION JUNE. Novels to be Read while you Wait for the Royal Show.—By C. E. Lawrence.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of May, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some June Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,
Stationer's Hall Court, London.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician

Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES

made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	767
The Festival	768
William Howard Taft—President	768
The Claim of Unmarried Women under the State Insurance Bill	769
The Mystery of Shakespeare's London Life—II.	771
Art and Civilisation	772
Reviews:—
A National Poet	773
"A Great Artist and a Noble-hearted Man"	774
The Mediæval Popes and Rome	775
A Warning Voice	776
Coronation Literature	777
Shorter Reviews	777
Fiction	779
Art	780
Some New French Books	780
The Story of a Book—III.	782
A Loathsome Book	783
The Plight of Portugal	783
The Theatre	785
Motoring and Aviation	787
Music	788
Some Old Theatres of Paris—II.	789
Through France in a Motor	790
Imperial & Foreign Affairs	792
In the Temple of Mammon	793
Correspondence	794
Books Received	795

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

IMPARTIALITY is the strong characteristic of the Coronation Honours List, which appears this week. Politics, the law, music, literature, medicine, the dramatic art, commerce—all are happily and with discrimination recognised as bearing necessary parts in the life of the nation, and the distinctions conferred are extended, it is pleasant to note, to those who carry on the work of Empire in distant lands. Sir Joseph Ward, Prime Minister of New Zealand, becomes a baronet; the Hon. Andrew Fisher, Premier of Australia, and Sir E. Morris, Premier of Newfoundland, are made Privy Councillors; and the British Minister at Panama, Mr. C. C. Mallet, is knighted. All lovers of literature will be pleased to see Professor Walter Raleigh's name in the list of new knights, but perhaps the most popular choice will be that of Mr. George Alexander, who has given pleasure to so many thousands by the delicacy, restraint, and humour of his acting. Dr. Frederic Cowen and Sir Edward Elgar receive due recognition for their services in the cause of music, and Major Ronald Ross, who is possibly the greatest authority we have on the subject of tropical diseases, and whose investigations have entailed enormous labour, thoroughly deserves his K.C.B. To go through the long list in detail would be impossible, but for once, we imagine, small cause will be found for the tribe of grumblers to exercise their voices in protest.

Lord Curzon of Kedleston, in proposing the toast of "Our Guests" at the dinner given by the Empire Press Union on Saturday last, remarked that he felt almost inclined to apologise to the visitors for the aspect London now presented. He did not know "whether to compare it to the state of a city under siege or a patient in splints;" but at any rate on Thursday the capital of the Empire would present an appearance that "neither Babylon in its splendour nor Rome in its pride" could ever have equalled. True: neither Babylon nor Rome rejoiced in the possession of electric light in their palmy days, nor, we presume, had they reached that apex of decorative art which is signified by glittering glass stars and crowns and paper flowers. The trouble with London on these occasions, when the fever for ornament and illumination seizes her, is that she is patchy and incoherent, to say nothing of being inartistic. On the actual route of the Royal Progress the result of the combined decorations is far from pleasing to the beauty-seeking eye. Colours are used indiscriminately; shades of red which never ought to be allowed within a mile of each other appear on adjacent buildings, to the punishment of any onlooker with the slightest pretension to taste; one house is arrayed in purple and fine linen, the next is content with a box of geraniums and a blue flag. On the night of the illumination some fronts will be a blaze of light, others will be mere dark blots; some will be outlined in brilliance, others will show a single star or circlet of lamps.

Thus there is no coherence, no control over the enthusiasm of patriotic and loyal subjects anxious to contribute their quota to the general spectacle. In place of a well-considered scheme of decoration we find a heterogeneous exhibition of colours that often clash violently enough to send a shudder through an artist's sensibilities. There is no reason why the whole business of street and house embellishment on an historic occasion such as the present should not be under the direct supervision of an expert temporary official, chosen especially for his ability on the decorative side of art. Variety, we all agree, is charming, and the evolution of some regular theory of ornamentation to be applied to the streets through which the Royal Procession will pass should present few difficulties, and need not mean any uninteresting sameness or dull repetition. At present one proprietor spends, perhaps, a couple of thousand pounds on elaborate ideas, while his neighbour's expenditure is a modest twenty or thirty pounds. If all the contributions were massed in a common fund, and controlled by a man whose aim was the creation of an artistic whole, a genuinely beautiful route worthy of the King and Queen of England, what might not be accomplished in the way of blended hues and fantasy of light!

The labour troubles which were so significant and unfortunate a feature of last year seem to have affected a class of men who hitherto have been remarkably free from discontent—the mercantile marine—and the situation, which no one considered serious at first, has taken a somewhat grave aspect. Departures of liners at provincial ports have been seriously delayed; sailors, firemen, and stewards have unitedly refused to sign on without an increase of wages, and in some cases the dock-labourers have struck in sympathy with the seamen. At Liverpool, Glasgow, Newcastle, Leith, Southampton, and other shipping centres trade is disorganised, and as delay in delivery of consigned cargoes is generally a costly matter the owners are on the horns of a dilemma. It is to be hoped that the present week will see the cessation of hostilities. The English seaman is on the whole too good a fellow to become a prey to the "labour agitator," and it is possibly because so much of his time is spent away from the land and its harpies that he has fallen an easy victim to plausible speeches.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE FESTIVAL

Within those solemn walls whose arches bend
  Over the sepulchres of England's dead—
Heroes turned dreamers in a tranquil land,
  To-day the great who linger yet attend
To set a golden crown upon his head,
  To place a jewelled sceptre in his hand.

And so, with stately ceremonial pomp,
  The King is crowned; but do we dream who find Within his realm a kinglier pageant still—
  Some tattered urchin pausing in his romp
To loose a farthing banner on the wind
  And cry "God save the King!" with all his will?

So when to-night your triumphing bonfires burn
  High on the hills, and by your lips outsung
Your eloquent homage to the stars is hurled,
  Still to his faithful poor our eyes shall turn,
Before whose homes their loyal hands have hung
  A little lamp to illumine all the world!

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT—PRESIDENT

BY GRANVILLE FORTESCUE

(Late A.D.C. to Theodore Roosevelt)

"THE President appointed!" William Howard Taft was appointed to the Presidency of the United States by Theodore Roosevelt. A startling statement, that involves an indictment of the election system of the greatest Republic, where supposedly the voice of the people proclaims their choice of ruler. Nevertheless it is true. The voice of the people was strong and vociferous for Roosevelt, but the call came to deaf ears. To take up the burdens of the nation and run with them for seven years was the limit of his duty, said Roosevelt. But he must have a successor—a man who understood his system of proposed national evolution, and was in sympathy with it, as well as being available in other ways. And William Howard Taft was that man. But all was not smooth sailing.

In America a change of Administration is analogous to a change of Government in England. It brings about, however, a greater revolution in the personnel of the appointive offices. This is true even when the new Administration is of the same political faith as that which preceded it. This fact, added to the great popularity of Theodore Roosevelt, threatened to upset his plans for designating his successor, for those holding appointive offices, from high Ambassador to lowly fourth-class postmaster, lent encouragement to the idea that the then President should succeed himself. When President Roosevelt saw that many men high in the councils of the Republican Party were determined that he should serve again, with customary strenuosity he organised an opposition to himself, and so manœuvred his forces that the Republicans in Convention nominated William Howard Taft for President. Such nomination was then tantamount to an election. Thus we have the President appointed.

Before we take up an analysis of his work as Chief Executive of the nation, let us review rapidly the posts Taft has held before. What we find remarkable is that they too were all appointive offices. His candidature was unique in that he had never been elected to any position before. From the time he was Collector of Internal Revenue to his accepting the War portfolio he was the choice of his superiors and not of the people. He was Judge, Solicitor-General, and Judge again before he became the first Civil Governor of the Philippines in 1901. This we fix as the date of the real beginning of his political career (he had been concerned with the judiciary before), for the opportunities of his position made for a development in the knowledge of the duties of an executive that fitted him for the different administrative offices which afterwards fell to his lot.

But this knowledge was not born without labour As Civil Governor, it was inevitable that there should be friction with the military. You have the same thing in India. Then the gathering up of the loose ends of government as left by the Spaniards, and weaving them into a pattern of efficient administration, was no easy task. This Mr. Taft accomplished, and more than this; he settled the delicate question of the disposition of the Friar Lands after a personal interview with his Holiness Pope Leo XIII.

Mr. Taft was appointed Secretary of War by President Roosevelt in 1904, and shortly became the most peripatetic Cabinet officer the country had ever known. We have no Colonial Office in America: the War Department does the work, so Mr. Taft soon became a sort of visiting physician who prescribed for the ills of our "insular possessions." (As a Republic we avoid "Colonies.") First, he visited Panama, to devise a working agreement that would allow the United States entire control of the canal construction. All Americans know how well he succeeded, and the rest of the world is awakening to a realisation of it. He helped Cuba through a revolutionary crisis. No, Cuba is not a Colony. It is a free, independent Republic. He journeyed to Porto Rico; things were tangled there. He straightened them. Next he went to the Philippines again, Japan, Russia, Europe, and once more made a triumphant return to Washington. Then, as we have seen, he became President.

The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every citizen the right to the pursuit of happiness and, as a corollary, the privilege of virulent criticism. All philosophers recognise the quality of happiness induced by the habit of criticism, so we should be a happy race, for it is given to us to criticise to the *n*th degree. What we have said about President Taft during the first year of his Presidency is literally unfit to repeat. He was accused of all the high crimes and misdemeanors of the day. He was a tool of the interests. Look at his multi-millionaire half-brother! He used his high office to forward petty spite. Why else should he wish to raise the postal rates on magazines? The magazines had criticised him. He was inordinately slow of decision (Roosevelt was arraigned for "snap judgments"). He sold the country's birthright for a mess of pottage - witness his modification of the conservation plans. And he stood for Ballanger! That was the last word until our foremost financier, who held the former President in about the same ratio of affection as the devil to holy water, declared "that he preferred Roosevelt as President; every one knew what to expect from him; but from this man [Taft], God alone knew what to expect!"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Thus we reached the ultimate of invective. The national question, "Has Taft made good?" was answered with a vibrant "No!" His best friends admitted they were disappointed.

Then came the change, the great reversal of decision. During the first months of his second year of office the country suddenly discovered that it was no complaisant Chief Executive of mediocre ability who sat in the White House. Instead, the people found they had a real head of Government, who initiated legisiation and carried it through with equal aggressiveness to Roosevelt. William Howard Taft had policies of his own. He began with recommendations of minor importance, economy in Government Departments and an attack on the semi-sacred "pork-barrel." He then evoked the two great issues that will mark a new epoch. Reciprocity and Universal Peace—these are the Taft policies. He takes his stand squarely on the matter of preferential, and has dared, when the representatives in Congress of his own party failed him, to call to his aid his political enemies. He won the Democratic leader, Champ Clark (whose zeal outstripped his judgment) to the cause He forced legislation through the Lower House, wherein the Democrats hold the balance of power, amid a chorus of opposition that drew a raucous echo from the Thames Embankment. And the solid and serious Mr. Bonar Law will wail in vain while the Canadian Reciprocity Bill receives the sanction of the American law-givers.

In the movement for universal peace President Taft has done more by the influence of his words and acts than any other national ruler. He went farther than the most enthusiastic advocate of Arbitration had heretofore dared when he made his famous declaration: "I do not see any more reason why matters of national honour should not be referred to a Court of Arbitration than matters of property or matters of national proprietorship." To arbitrate a question of national honour! There could be no point beyond this that would arise to perplex The Hague tribunal.

Mr. Taft is father of the "peace resolution" that passed the American Congress. This provides for the employment of international agencies for the purpose of limiting the armaments of the nations of the world, and of combining the navies of the world into an international force for the preservation of international peace. Since the failure of the Olney-Pauncefote Peace Treaty of fourteen years ago it has been impossible to broach the subject of an arbitration agreement between America and England until the present time. To-day we know that a Peace Treaty with Great Britain, free from all reservations, is being prepared, and such has been the tact and discretion employed in the preliminary discussions that its unanimous ratification by the Senate is assured. So we have President Taft as the true Apostle of Peace, one who does not halt in the realm of wise words, but who by his efforts brings into being results that prove the wisdom of his utterances.

Nations are moved by example, therefore it is safe to predict that the Great Britain-United States Arbitration Treaty will be but the forerunner of others similar in scope Thus time will bring the peaceful organisation of the world, and the causes of civilisation will make an advance undreamed of twenty years ago.

After this disquisition dealing with the public life of President Taft, my readers may be interested in the personal side of the American ruler. He holds in his physical self some indication of his habits of mind and character, but be not deceived by his appearance of easy complaisance. He is a big man, six feet two, weighing seventeen stone, but he is not the easygoing, good-natured type that is always supposed to be a consequence of large body. That famous smile has deceived many. Judge Taft was severe, and inclined to the maximum penalty in criminal decisions. And when angry he "gets mad all over," if I may be permitted the American colloquialism. I remember, in Cuba, when a careless translation of one of his decrees as Provisional Governor put him in the position of legalising horse-stealing, an eruption followed which threatened to shake one of our famous generals from his high position, and left a score of minor officials on the verge of instant dismissal. He has that forcefulness which implies temper behind it to make it effective. His legal training has left an imprint on his character to the extent of making him weigh carefully the evidence on any question that it is his duty to decide. Naturally this means that slowness of decision for which he has been so unfairly criticised. President Taft can see the other man's point of view only too well; but once convinced in his own mind as to the correctness of his position on any subject, it is impossible to make him alter that position. His loyalty is proverbial, as is his capacity for hard work.

The President is a conversational orator, witty at times, earnest and emphatic always. Although fond of riding and walking, he finds in golf his greatest recreation, and while not in the "first sixteen" is still far from being a duffer at the game. Putting is his forte. After the toils of the day he often takes long walks about Washington accompanied only by one or two aids in mufti. An enthusiastic theatre-goer, the White House box is always filled once a week at the different theatres by President Taft and his family. The hospitality of the White House has been even more lavish than during its occupancy by Mr. Roosevelt, when Washington was supposed to have reached its social climax.

President Taft has great charm of manner, being democratic in the best sense, and it was, perhaps, the greatest triumph of the Roosevelt Administration that gave to the American people a man with the large mental capacity and strong forcefulness as shown in the personality of William Howard Taft – President.

THE CLAIM OF MARRIED WOMEN UNDER THE STATE INSURANCE BILL

"It has been necessary to exclude married women (non-workers) from insurance, because it is impossible to devise any scheme to control claims for sick pay in such cases." It is in these terms that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his explanatory memorandum, briefly disposes of the claims of married women to share in the benefits which he proposes to confer upon their unmarried sisters.

It is no new thing for the married woman to find herself a stumbling-block in the regimentation of the nation. She will not fit in to the cadres devised for her brothers and sisters; like the queen-bee, she seems to require a cell shaped especially for herself, which will leave more room for her varied activities. And so she has to submit to special legislation, as in the Factory Acts, or find herself left out in the cold, as in this special instance.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Now there is no doubt that the legislator is confronted with a difficulty when he finds himself face to face with the claims of married women; but it is, to some extent at least, a difficulty of his own making, and is due to his failure to grasp the real economic position of the working man's wife. For instance, who are the "married women (non-workers)" who are to be excluded from the benefits of insurance? One's mind flies to the women of wealth and fashion who pay housekeepers, servants, nurses, and governesses to fulfil all their multifarious duties for them. But of course it is not these who are meant. It is the women who cook and wash and scrub, who bear and nurse and clothe and feed their children, and whose husbands are dependent on them alone for every scrap of comfort in their homes. Women such as these earn such living as they get many times over, and yet convention continues to call them "non-workers," dependent on their husbands, and to treat them as having no economic existence.

For the present purpose—the preservation of the health of the nation—the only rational basis for distinguishing between different classes of workers is that of their needs as arising out of their special functions. One, but only one, of the functions of the married woman is that of child-bearing; this function, with its attendant risks, is recognised up to a certain point in the Insurance Bill, and provision is made for it. Maternity benefit, as defined in the Act, consists of "Payment in the case of the confinement of the wife of an insured person, who is not herself an insured person, or of a woman who is an insured person, of a sum of thirty shillings." In the explanatory memorandum the benefit is 30s. payable from the father's insurance unless the mother is an insured person, when it will be paid from her own insurance. The two statements differ materially, as the first does not include unmarried women who are not insured, while the second does. It is an important point. The father of an illegitimate child is already liable to pay for its maintenance up to 5s. a week, and it should be made very clear that no provision of the Bill should be held to exonerate him from this liability.

If this protection of the man were adequately guarded against there seems no sufficient reason to suppose that the payment of maternity benefit to unmarried mothers would have the effect of conducing to immorality, as has been suggested by some critics of the Bill. It must be remembered that the benefit is to be expended on the mother's behalf. "Societies will not be allowed to pay this benefit in cash to the insured person or her husband" (or presumably to the man who is not her husband), "but will be required to pay expenses incurred up to the sum of 30s. under prescribed conditions." It is inconceivable that the prospect of 30s. expended on nursing, doctor's fee, and medical comforts will conduce to immorality while any woman, however abandoned in character, can get these now in any Poor-law infirmary. Moreover, it will, I take it, be quite within the discretion of the administering body to decide that the assistance should be given in an institution where it seemed desirable.

There is one other point of difficulty connected with the maternity benefit. It is that the woman who is herself insured (and she may be a married woman working for wages) will actually be a loser by it. Her insurance entitles her to 7s. 6d. a week and medical attendance when ill; but she will not be allowed to draw this for the four weeks after her confinement, during which she will be entitled to maternity benefit. She will thus forego 30s. and medical attendance, for 30s. expended on her behalf in medical attendance and other ways. This is not perhaps a very important point, applying as it will in a comparatively small number of cases; but it lends an additional weight to the claim being made by the Friendly Societies that the maternity benefit should be paid in cash. Their feeling is evidently strong that the manner of administering this benefit prescribed in the Bill involves a slur upon the character of the women or their husbands. It should be made quite clear that this is not intended; but it should be made no less clear that at present the working man, perhaps also his wife, does not attach sufficient importance to the special needs of mother and child during confinement and the subsequent four weeks. Until popular knowledge and feeling is more enlightened on this matter it is wiser that the money should be expended by those who do know, and will not be liable to have their judgment confused by pressing claims for arrears of rent, or new boots for the children, or the debt at the chandler's shop.

And when all difficulties and objections have been considered, the maternity benefit remains in the vast majority of cases a very great boon. If wisely administered—and there is no reason to doubt that it will be—it will mean a great reduction in suffering and mortality both to mothers and infants, and a good start in life to many who would otherwise begin their careers with some physical handicap.

If married women were liable to illness only in consequence of their function of child-bearing, and again, if child-bearing never brought illness except at the time of confinement, we might agree that their claims were fairly met by the maternity benefit. But the married woman has no immunity from all the other illnesses to which flesh is heir, and the claim which is met is merely a burden upon her strength additional to those which unmarried women have to bear. It is sometimes said that married women are too apt at malingering to be included in Friendly Societies, and this is what Mr. Lloyd George seems to have in mind in excluding them from the Bill. I believe that the contrary is true, and that the reason why they are difficult to include in Friendly Societies is that they are never willing to give up entirely and leave their work to take care of itself. How can they, so long as they can stand on their feet, when to give up means house and husband and children neglected, and the home life falling into ruin around them? Moreover, a man, when he returns to work after illness, does not expect to have to make up arrears. A woman knows that whatever is left in the way of washing, cleaning, or mending will simply accumulate and have to be done later on. Hence it is really difficult to ensure that she complies with the wise provision of complete abstinence from work upon which Friendly Societies insist.

But, whatever the difficulty in providing against it, the fact remains that the illness of the woman is in many respects more serious to the family than the illness of the man. They may run into debt if the man cannot work; if the woman is disabled they run into dirt, squalor, discomfort, and probably accumulating illness. Sick benefit which would enable her to pay for outside help to come in and keep the home in order would not only conduce to her own more speedy recovery, but would be of incalculable benefit to the children and husband.

But supposing insurance for a money benefit to be impossible, there is still, I think, a way in which the difficulty might be met. It was of course not possible to include everything in the Bill; otherwise one would have been glad to see some practical recognition of the great importance of skilled nursing in the homes of the people. In many ways the capable nurse is even more important to the restoration of health than the doctor himself. Why should not the married woman be insured, if not for cash benefit, yet for the services of a district or village nurse, who would—as many village nurses already do—help to keep the home in order as well as look after the patient? The nurse would have every opportunity to detect malingering, if indeed that is to be feared; the woman would have at least a better opportunity of recovering her health. I can think of no provision more likely to promote the health, not only of the patient, but of the whole family. The woman who has been well nursed herself knows how to nurse her husband and children when the need arises. Experience has shown, moreover, that where the nurse goes there cleanliness and air and light are swift to follow. She is the living embodiment of the truth that example is better than precept.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I am not suggesting, however, that the nurse should be in place of the doctor, but in addition. It is true that under the Bill married women are not to be allowed to insure, even for medical treatment; but as no reason is given for this deprivation, I cannot but think that it is an omission which might be easily remedied. The cost of such insurance without the addition of sick benefit is very small. I find on referring to the rules of the Metropolitan Provident Medical Association (an institution which works to the satisfaction of doctors and patients alike) that a woman can insure for medical treatment for 6d. a month, having her choice of a doctor, who will attend her in her own home if necessary. An additional charge is made of a penny for each prescription made up, and an extra fee for confinements of 15s. for the doctor or 7s. 6d. for the midwife. This extra fee is already provided for in the Bill; and there are few, if any, married women who cannot command the few pence necessary to pay the ordinary medical insurance. Why should not the State supplement this by insuring her in connection with one of the recognised Nursing Associations in addition to her medical insurance?

One reason why it is difficult to fit the married woman into the scheme is, no doubt, that as she does not work for a wage there is no employer from whom to claim a contribution. There are those who will not hesitate to say that she works for her husband, and that as he stands in the position of employer to her, so he should pay the employer's contribution. I do not at all agree with this view. The relation between man and wife is not that of employer and employed, and it would be disastrous to the interests of the woman to treat it as such. It is really a partnership, to which the man contributes in money and the woman in kind. To make the man responsible for the employer's contribution for the woman would be to make the firm pay twice over, since the woman would already be paying her own contribution.

But because the woman has no employer to draw upon, that is no sufficient reason for depriving her of the State grant if that will enable her to insure for medical and nursing aid. Moreover, it must be remembered that ultimately most married women will really have a balance to their credit for what has been contributed on their behalf previous to marriage. The cases in which working girls will require sick benefit before marriage will be comparatively few, and it seems peculiarly hard that they should forfeit all claims by the act of marriage, which, after all, is no offence. Nor does it constitute such a breach in the continuity of the working woman's life as the provisions of the Bill suggest. She is not passing from a life of work and independence to one of ease and dependence; she is merely taking upon herself new and often more arduous duties, under which she is even more likely to break down than when she was single. From every point of view then it seems desirable that some attempt should be made to secure for her at least the minimum of medical attendance and nursing.

HELEN BOSANQUET.

THE MYSTERY OF SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON LIFE—II.

IN connection with Shakespeare we hear nothing of a sixteenth-century Stella or Lady Hamilton, but still there is a vague suggestion in the sonnets of a dark lady who trifled with the poet's affections—"If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head." But is the suggestion so very vague after all? There are commentators who assert that this treacherous brunette was none other than Mistress Mary Fitton, of Gawsworth, Cheshire, Maid of Honour to the Queen from 1595 to 1601, and one of the giddiest Ladies-in-Waiting the Court has seen before or since. The two extant portraits of her at Arbury and her bust in Gawsworth Church show her of a fair complexion with light brown hair and grey eyes; but we must not deny poetic licence to the author of the sonnets, who declares in them, according to some twentieth-century literati, that "three Wills" were in love with this most wanton Lady—William, Lord Knollys; William Herbert, Lord Pembroke; and William Shakespeare, player, playmaker, and poet. "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will. And Will to boot, and Will in overplus."

On Mary Fitton's appointment to the Royal entourage her father wrote to Lord Knollys asking him to keep a watchful eye on the young girl so lately come to Court from her Cheshire home; but Sir Edward Fitton can have had but slight acquaintance with his relative, who was veritably a sixteenth-century "Gay Lord Quex," and whose solicitude soon ripened into an ardent affection for the tender lamb committed to his care—a lamb who soon declared herself a wolf in sheep's clothing. Yet the Fittons seem to have made light of Sir Knollys's attentions to their young daughter. He stood godfather to Mary Fitton's niece (Ann Newdigate's first child) in 1598, although his letters to Lady Newdigate at the time show him ardently in love with her wayward sister, and praying for the speedy demise of his aged wife. Yet when the latter died in 1605 he married two months after a nineteen-year-old bride, Lady Elizabeth Howard, whilst Mary Fitton, the object of his quondam illicit affection, was still at his disposal.

It does not seem quite certain whether Mary entered first into bonds of wedlock with Captain Lougher or Captain Polwhele; it is, however, more probable that Captain Polwhele undertook the tackling of so froward a lady at his Gloucestershire home at Perton; for Mary's mother, Lady Fitton, writes to her eldest daughter Ann soon after the wedding that Polwhele is "a veri knave, and taketh the disgrace off his wyff and all her ffryndes to make the world thynk him worthy of her and she deserved not better." Even in that age of loose morals Mary Fitton was looked upon as having seriously outraged the then female code of ethics. In a previous letter to her elder daughter, the mother writes:—"I take no joy to heer of your sister nore of that boy, if it had pleased God when I did bear her, that she hade bene beried, it had saved me from a grete deale of sorow and gryffe, and her ffrom shame, and such shame as never have Cheshyre woman; worse now than evar; wright no more of her."

At Court Mary Fitton was nicknamed the "Crow" ("a crow that flies in Heaven's sweetest air." Sonnet 70) from her birdlike profile; and her conduct seems to have lacked maidenly modesty and decorum in an outrageous manner, for we read that—"In the tyme when Mrs Fytton was in great favour, and one of her Majestie's Maids of honour (and during the time yt the Earle of Pembroke favoured her) she would put off her head tire and busk her upp her clothes, and take a large white cloak, and march as though she had been a man to meete her lover, William Herbert."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A letter from Sir Robert Cecil to Sir George Carew, dated February 5th, 1601, has a postscript to this effect:—

> We have news that there is a misfortune befallen Mistress Fitton, for she is proved with child, and the Earl of Pembroke, being examined, confesseth a fact, but utterly renounceth all marriage. I fear they will both dwell in the Tower a while, for the Queen hath vowed to send them thither.

A letter in the Record Office from Tobie Matthew to Dudley Carleton, dated March 25th, 1601, says:—"The Earle of Pembroke is committed to the Fleet; his cause is delivered of a boy who is dead."

A year previous Mary Fitton had withdrawn from Court to her father's Cheshire mansion at Gawsworth; some say her enforced retirement for a few months was owing to the birth of a stillborn child, whose father was none other than William Shakespeare himself. But why tarnish Shakespeare's memory with the paternity of the infant when Herbert, one of the most amorous bachelors of the day, was at that time that fair lady's most faithful and constant admirer? True, in October, 1599, he was sent on a mission to Denmark, then later he is "sick with a tertian ague," but during the remainder of the year he had been most frequent in his attendance at Court, with occasional absences consequent on his visits to Wilton, where his father lay sick.

Meantime the enthusiasm anent the new-born drama was at its height; there was an incessant demand for new plays. It has been computed that more original compositions were then produced in London in one month than now annually grace the theatre stages of the United Kingdom and America. And actors no longer occupied an ambiguous position in the social life of the period. Mr. Wyndham says that the "Court and Theatre were never in closer contact than during the last years of Elizabeth's reign . . . when the theatre was dignified by the very trick of majesty and the Court transfigured by the Spirit of Masquerade."

Actors and ladies of the Court held familiar converse together; Kemp, the comedian of Shakespeare's company, dedicated his "Morrice to Norwich" to Mistress Fitton, but the acquaintanceship can hardly have ripened into friendship, as Kemp mistook the lady's Christian name and addressed her by that of her elder married sister. Shakespeare himself, with his "gentle" manner and dignified bearing, may have been in request to teach the Court ladies their steps for the masques in which the Queen so delighted. The youth of the Warwickshire dialect had become the sixteenth-century man of the world, conversing in the pure English tongue as heard at the Court and in the county of Middlesex, and his friendship with certain of the Ladies-in-Waiting would follow as a matter of course.

Taking a dispassionate view of the known incidents of the great dramatist's life, from 1596 to 1601, does it not seem as though during those years he had felt the glamour of some fancy—passing it may have been—for a lady far above him in rank and position? In the August of 1596 he had visited Stratford for the burial of his only son Hamnet, and on his return to London may he not have tried to drown sorrow, to forget disappointed hopes—hopes centred on his son and heir—in a vortex of pleasure and dissipation? Later in the same year he appears at Stratford as the purchaser of "New Place," as the rebuilder of the shattered fortunes of his family; he next applies in his father's name for a grant from the Herald's Office to bear a coat-of-arms and rank as an esquire; he lends money; he gives corn during the Stratford famine; he takes shares in the Globe Theatre, and his plays of the period breathe an atmosphere of the Court and of the lords and ladies who "fleet the time carelessly as they did in the Golden World."

But throughout these successful years may he not have craved a little sympathy?—not the rough, jovial camaraderie of the Mermaid Tavern, of Ben Jonson and Marlowe and their "light o' love" wenches, but the sympathy women of all ages have known so well how to proffer, and none better than that class to which the whimsical, capricious Mary Fitton belonged. This Court coquette, "more fine and pretty than spark of velvet, and as witty as Pallas," would relish playing her part in healing the poet's heartache, and the latter would succumb to her wiles like so many frail mortals of his sex before and since, for all a woman's inborn vanity and desire to please, all her innate affectation, were to be found alike in sixteenth-century princess and peasant girl; and before aught else Shakespeare was human, and too delightfully so to detect a woman's false flattery when artfully practised on himself.

Maybe the sonnets do give us a glimpse of autobiography: after all, the theory of their "dark lady" may be no baseless conjecture. Who knows that the great actor-playwright, in times of extreme mental depression and languor, may not have yielded to the temptation of looking into the dim future and of dreaming that heaven could hold no greater happiness in store for him than a "Wanderjahr" in the Warwickshire lanes with Mistress Fitton, showing her the spot where he set his first snare, where the moorhen yearly made her nest, and the eaves beneath which the martin built? His thoughts may have lingered lovingly on the bright picture of the Maid-of-Honour seated on a bench in his newly-planted New Place orchard against a background of pink apple-blossom, or strolling by his side through the lime-tree avenue past the old Parish Church, and then by the Avon's bank over Sir Hugh Clopton's bridge. Next fancy makes us picture him, a shadow crossing his brow, expressing his views on the tragedy—if tragedy it were—of his own married life:—

> Let still the woman take,
> An elder than herself: so wears she to him,
> So sways the level in her husband's heart;
> For however we do praise ourselves,
> Our fancies are more giddy and infirm,
> More longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn,
> Than woman's are.

Alas! that so impenetrable a shroud of mystery envelops our greatest of Englishmen!

W. M. D.

ART AND CIVILISATION*

Professor Baldwin Brown is a high authority, and this eminently readable volume, which contains the substance of the Rhind Lectures delivered before the Scottish Society of Antiquaries in the spring of last year, fully justifies his reputation. It is a truism that to know one thing thoroughly you must know twenty others as well, and of no form of knowledge is this more true than of archæology. But Professor Baldwin Brown's knowledge is encyclopædic, and upon this score he need fear no criticism. His style is marked by a rich undercurrent of allusiveness; he traces things back to their dim origins in unsuspected and improbable sources, and he leaves you with the impression that these, too, reach back to dim vistas of the past, whither the searchlights of historical and scientific investigation have as yet had no opportunity to penetrate. With the modesty of the true scholar he opines that this book will supply a "groundwork" on the subject of which it treats: we shall be greatly surprised if there are many of his fellow-investigators who can add much to it, or who could have told us as much as he has succeeded in doing within so brief a compass.

In the Teutonic race we have, of course, an especial interest. For a while, as our author reminds us, it had

* The Arts and Crafts of our Teutonic Forefathers. By G. Baldwin Brown. (T. N. Foulis. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

the art field of Western Europe to itself—for the period, that is to say, between the disappearance of classical art and the rise of the mediæval Romanesque style. After that its activities lay in the direction of modifying the Romanesque into Gothic forms, of which the pointed arch was the outstanding sign and symbol. This movement took many shapes, and was far from being confined to architecture; it was applied to personal ornaments of all sorts, and to every kind of furniture and the decoration of the home. The inspiration was largely drawn, as might be expected from a race which had embraced Christianity comparatively recently, from Scripture subjects, already sanctioned by earlier Christian custom. Thus Daniel between two lions was a common device in early Teutonic jewellery, sometimes treated quite simply and recognisedly, but often so disguised by crudity of presentment or exuberance of fancy as to be scarcely recognisable at all. A fine and notable Teutonic survival is the famous "Gospels of Lindisfarne," with its magnificent Teutonic ornament, while similar Teutonic features appear in abundance in the architectural remains—crosses and such like—of the period. We should have liked in this regard some reference to the work of the Comacine masters, which "Leader Scott" believed was traceable in some forms of ornament, such as the endless knot, which Professor Brown seems inclined to treat as solely Teutonic. The question, however, is in any case an obscure one, and it would have required a good deal of valuable space to have treated it in any fullness. But some of the relics recovered reach back to a much earlier age. The famous treasure of Petrossa, for instance, is believed to be a product of the third or fourth centuries of the Christian era. Another fourth-century "find" was the wonderful collection of medallions of Roman Emperors of that period, unearthed a hundred years since near Grosswardein in Hungary; while the later discovery in the same neighbourhood some twenty years ago of a second treasure of golden bowls and fibulæ of the same period as the foregoing greatly accentuated their interest and value. In England we can show one of the most interesting of such discoveries, that of the pectoral cross of St. Cuthbert, who died in 687 A.D. Apart from its archæological interest it is a graceful and beautiful piece of jeweller's work, which would have done credit to any age. Another magnificent group of objects, unearthed in the tomb of Childeric, who died and was buried in the year 481, with their subsequent adventures, and the astonishing recovery of a large proportion of them, supply a splendid chapter of romance to add to the halo of mystery which must always surround such survivals of a hoary past.

Professor Brown gives us a fine chapter on this subject of Germanic burials, and their part in preserving for us these relics of antiquity—these relics that have heard and felt "the drums and tramplings of three conquests," as Sir Thomas Browne has it. For all who could afford it, from the earliest recorded ages of history, a proper equipment of tomb furniture to ease for the dead man his journey to the realm of shadows was indispensable, and women were sent on their way with such jewels and ornaments as their friends could muster for them. Professor Brown speaks of a description of such a tomb by M. Pilloy, who portrayed it "with a touch of sentiment which not even archæology can eradicate from the Gallic soul." But surely sentiment is inseparable from such things—and archæology is far from being "harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose"—though we are far from including the author in such a category. His book is steeped in the highest "sentiment" throughout, and therein lies its charm. The knowledge is there, too, as we have seen, but the ray of light that it casts upon the ways of our forefathers will connote for most of us its real value. We have studied it with pleasure and profit, and many others, we think, will do so too.

B

REVIEWS

A NATIONAL POET

Adam Mickiewicz: The National Poet of Poland. By MONICA M. GARDNER. 10s. 6d. net. J. M. Dent and Sons.

MISS GARDNER has done a real service. Adam Mickiewicz (to be pronounced Mits-kee-eh-vitch) is not a world poet, to be sure; yet it is not only world-poets who win the recognition of acknowledgment in other tongues than their own. If a rule were to be laid down that no poet who had not sung through his own tongue into the tongue and language of all time deserved tribute from other people than his own, what a mass of literature would find its way into the limbo of things forgotten! Fortunately, however, such a rule does not prevail. We say fortunately advisedly, for all poetry is an inspiration. Our own Daniel was no very great poet; indeed, his was, to be candid, a very pedestrian manner of song. Yet a poet of a far loftier flight—no less a man than John Keats—found not a little inspiration from a close study of him. And what can be won from so pedestrian a soul as Daniel can surely be won from a soul so fiery and so flaming as that of Mickiewicz. It may be thought that a spirit so full of impulse as his was of the genius to rise to the very heights of song. But his very excellence was his shortcoming; and therein he declared himself not for all time, but for a day. It was part of the tragedy with which his life was bound up that this was so. For he was a national poet; and the nation that claimed him was the unhappy Poland, doomed to eternal failure, and doomed to worse than failure—disastrous hopes and cruel treacheries. It was this that stung Mickiewicz to song, and his song was like a torch flung into the night with a fury of flame, to fall hissing into the lake which quenches all things that are not lit in a beauty of spirit. It is not the least of the sorrows of Poland that her greatest poet should have been robbed by time of those conditions which might have helped him to a song that should abide and continue.

Adam Mickiewicz was born on the Christmas Eve of 1798, at the height of Napoleon's power, and his youth was spent in the secret glory that thrilled through the country at the increasing fame of the famous Polish legion. It was to Napoleon they looked for the deliverance of their country. He was pledged to it by promise; and he was pledged to it by honour—a pledge, this last, that to a people so quick and noble as the Poles was a bond far more indelible than written and signed documents. "Poland hath not perished while we live" was the song that the Polish legion sang; and it was, too, the hope and support of their country. Closely guarded by Russia, jealously watched lest any news from the front of war should reach into and so disturb the country, information nevertheless filtered through. A wounded soldier here, coming to bury his bones in his beloved fatherland, a straggler there—thus the news came in, and thus the country fed itself with hope. Even the calculated betrayal of the Treaty of Tilsit did not suffice wholly to quench their zeal for him and their hope for their country. But when in the disastrous retreat from Moscow the terrible and onerous position of rearguard was entrusted to the men Napoleon had so ruthlessly betrayed only a few years before, and the nation saw the flower of their people, the strength of their manhood, ruined and destroyed, and Napoleon, in whom they yet held faith, broken and defeated by their heartless oppressors, then, as a writer has said with regard to another ruinous epoch of their history, "there remained nothing more, except a nation that refused to die."

From this time onward the country was more and more ground under the heel of Russia. Alexander the First, despite his promises to his friend Adam Czartoryski, and despite his boasted desires for liberal reform, betrayed the country as ruthlessly as Napoleon had done. As Miss Gardner says:—"The liberties of the country were trampled under foot, her freedom changed into oppression, her nationality attacked by Russian espionage, imprisonment, tortures in the prisons." Then, "maddened by their wrongs, the Poles flew to arms, and rose on the night of November 29th, 1830." The issue was short and sharp. The Poles were not only beaten, they were crushed. To quote Montalambert, the usual methods of Russian revenge turned Poland into "the nation in mourning." The chief men were tried, if to "try" means to employ judicial mockery for the achievement of a prearranged end. Previously to this Adam Mickiewicz had been exiled to Russia at first, and had finally been liberated from that country to wander through Europe. He was in Rome when the rising occurred, and a vast gloom enshrouded him as he witnessed the final extinction of his beloved country. It found expression in his poem "To the Polish Mother," of which Gabriel Sarrazin has said, "Chaque fois que j'ai rélu cette pièce, je me suis senti pâle à mourir."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was finely characteristic of the man that he never permitted his hatred of the country to obscure his love of the individual Russians he had met in his exile. But it can be readily understood that the series of disasters that swept over Poland, loving his country as he and all his compatriots do, must needs have withheld his muse from those world-wide themes that have marked poetry at its highest and best. He was, as Miss Gardner has phrased it in her subtitle, a "national poet." Poem after poem flows from his pen in mournful testimony to the past greatness or the present distress of his country. Therefore it is with a small, if a very noble, fragment of the world's population that his verse is concerned. It is even epochal. But there is more in it even than this. It affected his thought, even as it had affected the thought of his country. The terrible sorrows that the country had passed through had produced its philosophical outlook. Man is a philosophising creature, and his philosophy is generally a garment shaped to his stature. So it was with the Poles; for they found refuge in Mesyanism, holding that their special suffering was but the prelude and preparation for a time of great exaltation, and that their miseries were the token that they were being fitted in this way to a high moral vocation. While this gave at times an extraordinary depth to Mickiewicz' thought, it also, at the same time, gave it something of the shape of the ready-made doctrine.

Poem after poem followed, each dedicated to his country in some aspect. Either it sings her depth of gloom, as in the pæan of sorrow, "To the Polish Mother;" or it concerns itself with her grief in his dark and troublous tragedies. Miss Gardner very justly and truly says that there is something in Mickiewicz akin to the great old Hebrew prophets. When such a mind as Æschylus's was smitten to the writing of a tragedy, it was the terror of the problems that beset humanity that stung his mind. There was the same cosmic splendour in the tragedies of Shakespeare. But when Isaiah rose to eloquence, it was not a world that he thought of, but a nation. It was not a suffering humanity that exalted his thought to grapple with the things of time; his might of passion was concerned with the setting right of an erring people. So with Mickiewicz. He wrought no King Lear; it was beyond his mind, though not beyond his power, to create a Prometheus in grapple with a destiny that was cosmic. His characters were not only hewn out of his country's troubles; they were actually modelled, and even named, after those of his compatriots who had taken part in Poland's struggles for liberty. His very scenes were not creations of his imagination; they were more or less faithful transcripts from memory of those in which he had participated, such as the scene in the Basilian convent in the third part of "The Ancestors." One of the leading characters in this play, Konrad, was modelled on Mickiewicz himself. Speaking of this tragedy Miss Gardner says:—

> Not only is it the noblest monument to suffering and persecuted Poland, but in its pages we have glimpses—rifts through the veils of dream and mystery—into the story of Adam's inner life, such as he has given us nowhere else. And, further, as a picture of the soul driven to despair, not by its own misery, but by the sight of the sorrows of a nation, unrelieved, unavenged by Heaven, "The Ancestors" ranks as one of the great so-called sceptical dramas of the world; by the moral standpoint of a Job or a Faust. We must remember, when considering the literary work and the mental attitude of the great romantic Polish poets in the thirties and onwards of the last century, that they and their nation were one, to modify slightly Mickiewicz's expression. Their nation's grief was their own personal grief.

It was this mood that actuated his work, and framed it to a special end.

There are two things especially characteristic of his work: this identity with his country that has already been spoken of, and a vein of peculiar mysticism. Indeed this latter was more than mysticism. It was rather a kind of familiarity with the occult. The ancient festival—a relic from the days of paganism—which was usually celebrated on the night of All Souls' Day in the Lithuanian wilds, during which feast the spirits of the dead were exorcised into the secluded company, is sufficient evidence to show that this was a strong national trait. But that it was fed and fostered by the spirit of rebellious patriotism is surely evident. All that was intensely national in the man burned to an eager flame, and thus found its way into artistic expression. And at the height of its passion it turned in upon itself and produced, not mild and poignant tragedies, but the pure, serene, idyllic epic "Thaddeus." It was as though his country could bear no more pain; so he must nurse it and nourish it. His was a great soul; and in bringing him nearer to us Miss Gardner has done us a considerable service.

"A GREAT ARTIST AND A NOBLE-HEARTED MAN"

Franz Liszt and his Music. By ARTHUR HERVEY. (John Lane. 4s. 6d. net.)

A SHORT book in English upon the work of Liszt as a composer has long been wanted. It is thirty years since the translation appeared of Mme. Ramann's biography of Liszt, and although reference has necessarily been made by English writers on music to the influence exercised by Liszt on the orchestra, not one of them, so far as we are aware, has anticipated Mr. Arthur Hervey in the production of a book which, as the author hopes, "may serve as an introduction to the study of the master's works."

There is, perhaps, no great composer who has been so seriously misunderstood, so grievously neglected in England as Liszt. Gallant attempts have from time to time been made by his disciples to force the attention of the musical public to the wealth of beauty, the variety of interest it would find if only it would take the trouble to try and understand the more important compositions of Liszt. But these attempts have generally been in vain. In France, in Germany, in Italy, one may make sure of hearing Liszt's Symphonic Poems and the great Symphonies—the present writer recently found "Les Préludes" and "Hamlet" in the programmes of open-air concerts in Austria, and the audiences rejoiced in them—but in England the few Poems that are performed are so infrequently given that they do not become thoroughly known. Some years ago Sir Henry Wood designed to play all the twelve Symphonic Poems at his Promenade Concerts, but, for reasons which it was not impossible to guess, the plan had to be given up. And still, for the majority of amateurs, these splendid works are sealed books, and Liszt is only an eccentric pianist of great executive powers who composed two "display" Concertos and an infinite number of pianoforte fantasias and transcriptions adorned with "fireworks" of a flashy and meretricious kind. The old legend still lingers that Liszt was a fashionable Abbé who played marvellously and was unfaithful to his vows. "I think Liszt one of those people who ought not to have been allowed to live," exclaimed a very clever and cultivated lady in the present writer's hearing, when she was invited to listen to his Sonata, and she could only refer to this legend and to the fireworks on being asked what she meant.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The movements of "taste" are generally controlled in England by fashion or infatuation. Various circumstances have conspired to bring the music of Wagner, of Richard Strauss, and of Debussy under the influence of fashion, but Liszt has never come under that wayward spell. Perhaps it is as well that it should be so, and that his ultimate recognition by England as one of the great masters should be due solely to the strength of his genius. But the faculty which English people have of becoming infatuated with certain phases of art has had a good deal to do with the indifference—nay, the open hostility—shown here in many not uninfluential quarters to the music of Liszt. When the liking for "serious" music began (it quickly developed into a rage), and the "Monday Pops" were always "Sold out," while seats could seldom be had for the early Richter Concerts, it was the mode to adore the classics, and to claim Schumann as supreme among the romantic composers. Then, under the guidance of Joachim, Brahms was admitted as the third in an unapproached trinity, with Bach and Beethoven. Joachim's attitude towards Liszt was known, and it was soon considered that he who took pleasure in such works of Liszt as he was permitted to hear was a heretic only to be pardoned on the ground of ignorance. The infatuation for Brahms and for Joachim has undoubtedly been a cause of the non-appreciation of Liszt in England. But it may be hoped that we are gradually becoming fairer, more open-minded about music; and Mr. Hervey, though finding it difficult to avoid a "feeling of sadness at the thought of so many beautiful tone-poems being neglected," is not entirely pessimistic. He hopes that the day is not far distant when "tardy justice shall be meted to a great composer whose wonderful executive skill has seemingly caused his creative ability to be underrated, and who is par excellence the pioneer of the modern musical movement." In thus referring to the importance of Liszt's work as a pioneer, Mr. Hervey is only alluding to what ought to be a familiar fact to the most elementary student of modern musical history. But he rightly guards himself against the possibility of being considered as only one of those who admires Liszt because he indicated new paths in which later composers have walked with success. Mr. Hervey contends with perfect justice that Liszt was much more than a "gifted pioneer who had not the requisite inventive genius to realise his ideals." He claims him as a great creative artist whose place is by the side of the most famous composers of this or any age, and quotes Wagner's saying to Liszt, "Your orchestral works are so new and incomparable to any others that criticism will take a long time to discover what to make of them."

It may be that Mr. Hervey in his enthusiasm for Liszt's genius, and his indignation at the indifference of the English multitude towards it, has over-filled his pages with laudation of his hero. Some readers may suspect that he protests too much. If such there be, and these have doubts as to Mr. Hervey's impartiality, let them read what Wagner has said about Liszt, what Saint Saëns, and Smetana, and Grieg, and Weingartner have said; what critics at home such as Niecks and Ernest Newman have written; let them ask any of the fine pianist-musicians who play the Sonata and the other great pianoforte poems what they think about this music. The result of all this questioning will be the confirmation of everything that Mr. Hervey has written about "this great artist and noble-hearted man."

Mr. Hervey has properly devoted the larger part of his book to a careful and very musicianly analysis of Liszt's chief works for piano, for orchestra, for voice, but in his brief account of the "Life" he has been admirably successful in bringing out the wonderful nobility of Liszt's character, that radiance of soul which makes one love the man as one loves Walter Scott—not for what they did so much as for what they were. Weingartner has said that no one, even among those who do not appreciate Liszt's compositions, would wish to take from him the brilliant crown which disinterestedness and the noblest charity have placed upon his brow. We trust that what Mr. Hervey tells them about Liszt's life will send many readers to Mme. Ramann's biography, and that what he tells them about his music will move them to become diligent students of it.

THE MEDIÆVAL POPES AND ROME

History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages. By Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Authorised English Translation. Edited by Luigi Cappadelta. Vol. I. (Kegan Paul and Co. 15s. net.)

Professor Hartmann Grisar writes in his Foreword: "The present work might be described as a history of the mediæval Popes, with the history of the City of Rome, and of its civilisation as a background, the author's desire being so to combine the two stories as to produce a true picture of what Rome was in the Middle Ages." The extensive excavations carried on in the Eternal City during the last forty years have brought so much new material to hand that, excellent as was Ferdinand Gregorovius's "History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages," it must now, in many respects, be regarded as somewhat out of date. The Registers of the Popes, the studies of Duchesne and Mommsen, as well as of Hülsen and the German Institute of Rome have been the means of considerably adding to our store of knowledge on the subject. Professor Grisar claims no bias or prejudice in his colossal undertaking, and for the most part he adopts the rigid standpoint of the historian. That a Roman Catholic writing on this theme should be entirely without religious bias is not to be expected. On one occasion he leaves his remarkable knowledge of Roman topography, and in discussing the tomb of St. Peter enters into the old controversy based on Christ's words: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church." From a Protestant point of view these words have been juggled with past recognition, and in this one instance the author has trenched a little "on the so-called Roman question." But, apart from a very pardonable deviation of this kind, Professor Grisar has dealt with his subject with strict impartiality and extreme tolerance.

The opening chapter deals with the "Last Revival of Paganism in Rome." We see Flavian leading the procession of Isis, and come in touch with the mystery of Cybele and the festival of Mithra. Flavian was filled with a fanatical desire to revive the worship of the old gods. He had, however, to contend with a counter-force led by the Emperor Theodosius, who was just as zealous to establish the worship of Christ and to banish for ever the effete religion of the Romans. Theodosius thus addressed his generals:—"We should not offer such insult to the Cross of Christ as to fancy it has no power. Still less ought we to let ourselves be frightened by an image of Hercules. Well, then, the Cross goes before us; may the image of Hercules be the enemy's best protection!" Theodosius carried the passes of the Julian Alps, and Flavian met his death. Almost immediately afterwards we read of Theodosius engaged in a fierce battle with his pagan rival Eugenius. The armies met near Aquileia, and after a severe engagement the victory fell to Theodosius. Professor Grisar thus sums up the significance of this success:—"The great event of a single one-day battle decided for all time the religious fate of Italy and Rome." From this time onward Christianity had the protection of the State; but nevertheless Paganism died hard. The old temples may have been deserted, and the sacrifices and wild orgies neglected, but the coarse and debasing gladiatorial combats were still in vogue for some time to come. The fall of Paganism in no way meant a sudden acceptance of a cleaner and more strenuous life. Had that been the case, it may be that Rome could have withstood the barbarian invasions from the North. Paganism had sapped her strength, vice and sensuality had taken away even a desire for supremacy, and left instead men who only delighted in a debased form of amusement. It would seem from certain remarks of St. Ambrose that even the much-lauded Vestal virgins were well paid to be virtuous. They made of their chastity a tawdry show when compared with Christian maids who led simple, pure lives without desire for earthly reward. St. Ambrose remarks dryly, "If we Christians wanted to secure Government pay and privileges for all these, there would be prompt danger of an empty exchequer."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Professor Grisar, after describing several men of mark at that period, Christians who never tired of rendering succour to the poor, and were in every way worthy of their calling, deals with "The Shady Side of Early Christian Life." He points out that even among the clergy there were men who were but lukewarm Christians. St. Jerome thus warns his maiden disciple, Eustochium:—

> There are brethren of my profession who take priest's or deacon's orders only that they may approach women without restraint. All their care is given to their garments, which must exhale choice perfumes, while their footgear must be supple and well-fitting. Their hair is waved with curling-tongs, and their fingers glitter with rings. Such gentlemen can only mince along the street on tip-toe, lest the filth should soil their dainty shoes. To see them, one would fancy they were bridegrooms, rather than priests. Some of them make it their sole study to find out the names, homes, and mode of life of all the matrons. I shall describe one such worthy, and you will be able to guess what the pupils of such a teacher must be like.

Salvianus reminds us strongly of the utterances of Jeremiah when he sees the once proud and mighty Rome overpowered by the Germanic invasions. He cries:

> Where is any misery like unto ours? Yet none the less, in the midst of all this distress, the whole Roman world continues abandoned to sinful pleasure. Romans have become beggars, yet they jest. To-morrow bitter captivity awaits them, but their only thought is for the circus. . . . Death surrounds us, and we laugh. One could imagine all Romans had tasted the sardonic laughing-plant. They die still laughing.

Though Rome quaked beneath such barbarian leaders as Alaric and Attila, though her streets were filled with the pillaging Goths and Huns, Alans and Skynes, and her political life came to an end, the Church's power continued to extend. The days of "rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" were at an end. Through martyrdom and the tumult of war evolved the Roman Church. The imperial eagle gave place to the dove. If the Roman gods still haunted their old temples, they did so without worshippers, and may be within sound of Christian bells.

A WARNING VOICE

Triumphant Vulgarity. By Charles J. Whitby, M.D. (Stephen Swift. 3s. 6d. net.)

With excellent irony, and with just sufficient gentle exaggeration to emphasise his points, Dr. Whitby carries through neatly and logically his elaborate grumble with the state of social affairs at the present day in this country. We have read few books on similar or kindred themes with such a sane and level-headed treatment. Life is no light gift, to be used carelessly or idly, to Dr. Whitby. "To live as becomes a man on the level of his age—I will not say as one very far in advance of it—is no mere matter of respiration, assimilation, and reproduction, with a little docile industry thrown in by way of promoting the combustion of the waste products of metabolism. To live is not, in fact, as we understand it, the following of the line of least resistance." By these sentences in his introductory chapter the author prepares us for his serious discussion of the problems to follow.

He occasionally goes too far, of course, as when he says that it is in England "shocking 'bad form' to display any symptoms of æsthetic or intellectual superiority," or when he remarks that "enthusiasm for any mortal thing except dividends or golf is anathema maranatha." Such little slips are born of his own enthusiasm, and may be regarded indulgently. Later in the volume, when he comes to analyse and discuss Socialism, his insight is notable. He shows up the folly of expecting life to conform to rules, to be bound by the terms of a philosophy; he indicates the nice distinction to be drawn between identity of interests and community of interests; and he has a pungent page or two dealing with the ideals of the tub-thumping democrat. Let us quote a paragraph from "Psycopathia Socialis:"—

> Mere altruistic devotion to the welfare of the "workers," haphazard assurance that the triumph of their "cause" necessarily involves the betterment of the lives of those who live by their heads as well as of those who live by their hands, must, since there is in politics no such thing as gratitude, inevitably lead to disillusionment and betrayal. For the manual workers are many, and, since they have the vote, are, as they now begin to realise, powerful; the brain-workers are comparatively few and, politically speaking, unimportant. More beef, more beer, more football, and more bank holidays: these in brutal verity are the aims underlying and energising those agitations of the Labour Party for which such high-sounding motives are, in all innocence and good faith, being alleged by its middle-class bottle-washers and camp-followers. I envy the optimism of those who imagine that when the "working man" has got so much of these good things as his heart desires he will care a brass farthing what fate befalls his former allies. . . .

The chapter entitled "The Paper Age" is a fine glimpse at the results of the modern passion for writing and reading; but we cannot stay to quote more. The remedy suggested by the author—a society formed of men and women whose thoughts and ideals are definitely turned towards the solution of the problems of human destiny by practical methods—seems sensible and feasible; but we rather doubt whether it would contain in itself the germ of permanence. However that may be, Dr. Whitby has in his own way done good work for the cause he has at heart, and we commend his latest book to all who are interested in the struggle between Capital and Labour, the problems of ethics and morals—in a word, the many arresting signs of the times which are evident in English life to-day.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CORONATION LITERATURE

Rex et Imperator: Coronation Ode. By J. H. E. While. Illustrated by Edward Morton and H. Foster Newey. (Siegle, Hill and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Vision of the King. By Regina Miriam Bloch. (Greening and Co. 6d. net.)

Coronation Poem and Love-Songs. By K. H. D. Cecil. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)

Forms of Prayer, with Music edited by Sir Frederick Bridge, Mus.Doc. (Novello and Co., Ltd., and Eyre and Spottiswoode, Ltd. 1s. net.)

The Form and Order of the Coronation Service. (Novello and Co., Ltd.)

A tremendous outpouring of miscellaneous literature was to be expected in connection with the principal event of the present year, and we select a few of the best specimens for notice. Mr. Ernest While's elaborate "Ode on the Coronation of their Most Gracious Majesties" is bordered and illustrated very beautifully by his collaborators, and most of his versifying is good. In places, however, he spoils the effect of otherwise meritorious stanzas by faulty rhyming: "explores" and "cause," "main" and "name," we may gently point out, do not run happily in the harness of rhyme. The "charger wight," on page 10, must be a slip for "charger white." With these exceptions, the daintily-produced little volume is an admirable souvenir of the celebrations.

As is usual with the work of Miss Bloch, the "Vision of the King" has a touch of mysticism, obtained, so far as we can judge, more by the use of a peculiar style of words and exotic composition than by genuine, inherent emotion. The scene of the word-play is Westminster Abbey, and "in the chequered violet glow" a spirit addresses the King:—

> . . . To thee I come from blue infinitudes. Yea, I have left the empyrean heights and trod the shining ladder Jacob saw that dead, strange night at Bethel when he slept upon the stone which rests beneath thy chair. From the bright company of saints I trend, whose fleckered haloes circle in wide maze about the daïs of the Eternal King and from whose serried ranks glad hymnal lutes in rippling pæans of praise and fair delight. . . .

Thus the spirit; and other characters—King Aidan, King Alfred, Canute, "Edward, the Confessor yclept," and King Edward VII.—carry on the conversation. In her own original way Miss Bloch writes well, and her volume makes a pleasant change from the ordinary run of Coronation booklets.

With varied rhythms and forms, and one accomplished essay in the terza rima, K. H. D. Cecil commemorates the crowning of King George V. and Queen Mary. The poem, under its several headings, only occupies ten pages out of the sixty-three which complete the book; the remaining "Love-Songs" are very delicate and charming, almost without exception, but in the present notice we cannot treat them with the lengthier attention which they deserve.

The "Forms of Prayer," with suitable music, and the "Form and Order of the Coronation Service" will be treasured by those who wish to reproduce, in less ambitious modes, the majestic harmonies of the Abbey. Stainer, Elgar, and Bridge are names to conjure with in the musical world, and in the thicker of these two volumes will be found compositions by many other well-known men. Both of the books are clearly printed and well arranged, and should have a large sale.

The Coronation Number of Punch is somewhat of a tour de force in humorous work. It must have been no easy matter to have selected every item so that the event of the week should be referred to, but Punch, or Mr. Owen Seaman and his assistants, has managed it, and he, or they, must be congratulated heartily. "Mr. Punch's Variety Entertainment" is excellent, and the illustrations will cause chuckles enough to last a month. Especially good is page 435, where Chaucer misses the Canterbury excursion train. Ethelred the Unready causes an obstruction at a Tube booking-office, and other historical characters are spiked by the wit of Mr. George Morrow. The "Daily Evening's Prize Coronation Ode" is very funny indeed, with its specimens of verse which every editor will recognise as cruelly near to the truth; but we must leave our readers to explore this special issue on their own account. We can promise them that the sixpence will be well spent.

The special number of the Field, issued this week, is devoted to a most interesting résumé of historical Coronation affairs in general, the accessories, which are apt to be overlooked, receiving exceptionally good treatment. The Regalia, the Investiture of the Prince of Wales, the Horse in Coronation Ceremonies, the Coinage and Coronation Medals, the Royal Stables, the Old State Coaches—these and other subjects constitute a very fine souvenir indeed of the festivities of the present week. Over two hundred illustrations diversify the pages, and a good full-page portrait of his Majesty George V. and the Prince of Wales is included. At the price of a shilling this special issue is wonderful value.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Through the Alps to the Appenines. By P. G. Konody. (Kegan Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

The experiences of a traveller who passes by motor through four European countries cannot fail to be varied. Mr. Konody's trip was decidedly a comprehensive one, since it included France, Italy, Austria, and Germany. It is to Italy, however, that by far the greatest space in the volume is devoted. The author professes himself a lover of the land of sunshine, oranges, and architectural beauty, and he gives abundant evidence towards the proof of his claim in the course of the book. The choice of route here was judiciously chosen. The reasons that urged Mr. Konody towards that particular selection of the picturesque are best given in his own words:—

> Italy herself is so inexhaustible in her ever-varied attractions that motoring soon becomes a means of seeing the less tourist-ridden parts of the country within reasonable time. Many of the most attractive cities and monuments of Italy are so difficult of access by any other means of locomotion that a week would be needed to do the work done by car in a day. Only it is necessary not to be too voracious—to be content with seeing the best, and only the best, and to know by previous study where the best is to be found.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This method might be studied with advantage by all those who intend to put their tyres to the proof on the Southern roads. The result, as shown by the material of the book, has been highly successful. We obtain, for instance, impressions and sketches of the town of Volterra that are valuable, and the chapter on unspoiled San Gimagnano, "the City of Beautiful Towers," is of great interest. Indeed, the collection of descriptions of Art galleries, edifices, and monuments has been brought together with a skill and discrimination that makes it well worth perusal by all who are interested in the fine arts of the Peninsula.

So far as the actual journey was concerned, the problem of dust that is common to all countries occasionally reached a climax. As the author himself realised, it is improbable that the course of the car was invariably followed by benedictions on the part of the peasantry. Here is the account of a meeting with a brother-disturber of the powdery soil of the marble region:—

> Right in front of us on the straight road we saw a dense volume of smoke, which made us think the whole countryside was on fire, until it dawned upon us that we were merely facing an approaching car, and that the supposed conflagration before our eyes was no worse than the one behind us, of which we ourselves were guilty. Luckily there was a little branch road on the right, leading to a farmhouse. We ran up this providential refuge some fifty yards, and quickly improvised a roof of rugs and overcoats, under which we ducked as the cloud drew near . . . we had to wait a good two minutes before we could venture to peep out, and even then the landscape appeared as through a veil of heavy mist.

The sketches of the Austrian and German towns and scenery that were passed on the homeward way of the car are very effectively rendered. To those who are concerned with landscape and Nature rather than with art and sculpture this latter part of the work will prove at least as interesting as the first. The volume is liberally provided with photographs and with pencil-sketches.

Cheapside to Arcady. By Arthur Scammel. (Andrew Melrose. 5s. net.)

To the dweller in a great town is given a faculty lacking to the large majority of Arcadians—the faculty of appreciating in its full intensity the poignant charm of meadow, woodland, and stream. To the countryman these things are hard realities of everyday life. The meadow is for mowing, the wood for felling. Often the placid stream of summer is a devouring fiend in winter. And ever present is the uncouth figure of labor improbus, unrelenting toil, which doubtless bestows upon the rustic scene much of its charm, but loses none of its unpleasantness for the labourer by reason thereof. The casual visitor from Cheapside sees but the glory and the freshness of a dream, and is blind to the latent spectre of duris urgens in rebus egestas. Well for him, happy man! With him we have no quarrel, for it is good to be reminded now and again of the beauty of quiet rustic scenes; to have one's mind "swept of all careful worldly thought, and garnished for a time with the peace and beauty of summer."

The prevailing tone of this pleasant book is one of gentle appreciation of small beauties, tinged here and there with traces of cultured melancholy. Why is it that the contemplation of beauty should so commonly produce in the beholder a subdued feeling of sadness? A few of these essays have already appeared in the pages of various periodical publications, and they are almost uniformly good. Good because they do not fly too high, but, like the muse of Horace, realise the margin of safety for literary flight. You dream sometimes of that land of perpetual summer which lies over the hills and far away, and at times the dream becomes vivid. You see the glorious purple hills, ridged with the light that never was on sea or land, the immortal blue pine trees, through which floats the voice that oft-times hath charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn; and upon a sudden your dream takes mortal shape, and you realise that the sun is setting in fair Surrey, and that if you do not bestir yourself you will miss your train back to town.

Is it credible that an author of Mr. Scammel's calibre should quote, or rather misquote, those peerless lines of Keats' as "magic casements opening on the foam of charmed seas in fairy lands forlorn"? 'Twere more charitable surely to suppose that the printer, being a man of poetic instinct, substituted what, in his view, was a more appropriate epithet. One is reminded of Matthew Arnold's classic misquotation from the same author's "moving waters at their priestlike task of pure ablution round Earth's human shores," wherein "pure" appeared as "cold." Keats must positively have squirmed in his lowly bed. Sed haec hactenus. This book should do something towards instilling into the mind of the thoughtless or unobservant Londoner a measure of gratitude to our London parks and trees. These notes are written beneath the daily-growing shade of the Temple planes. Upon a sweltering August day this spot is a perfect little oasis amidst the waste of brick and stone. Therefore let no man impugn the beauty of the plane-tree.

The Belmont Book. By Vados. With an Introduction by Arnold Bennett. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

We read every page of this book with pleasure and genuine relaxation. It is a book of pure delight, as refreshing as a holiday; indeed, it is a holiday. It transports you to Normandy and guides you through that charming country, enabling you to get the joy and tonic of the atmosphere, and your mind to stretch itself in the quiet and beauty of the surroundings.

As Mr. Arnold Bennett claims in his too short preface, this is not a Nature book, but a human nature book. Written by a woman, Mr. Bennett tells us, and a woman novelist resident in Paris, he warns us that—

> She is just the sympathetic spectator and listener at large—utterly at large. She is exercising a faculty which knows nothing of either selection or prim orderliness. She goes her own way, and she must be followed in the spirit in which she goes. The wise reader must be prepared for anything and everything; he must prime himself with the conviction that the one regularity of this book will be the regularity with which the unexpected happens in it. Thus, for example, in the chapter entitled "Harvest" he will find very little about harvesting, but a great deal about rural dinner-parties—such Norman repasts as Guy de Maupassant, reciting them, twisted and hammered by his overbearing and splendid art into dramatic pages, but which my authoress, more realistic than the realist, presents to you in their original naïve straightforwardness. Thus also the reader should not ask himself why the book has been called "Belmont." There is much about Belmont in it, but there is much more that is not about Belmont. A writer with a mania for giving accurate definition might have been inclined to call it "The Moulin de la Lavindiere Book," or even "The Normandy Book," neither of which titles would have been so happy as the slightly unreasonable "Belmont."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Belmont is the name the authoress gives to a little town in Lower Normandy, but Belmont is not the real name of the town. It is an ancient town of really splendid history, but off the beaten track, only to be found by those who have a scent, and only to be enjoyed by those who know the best things life has to offer. It is here, in this ancient little town, with the monuments of the past in its stores and the memories of its founders yet in its people, that the authoress has a little cottage, a perch out of human reach, from which can be sung the individual note without fear of disturbance or overhearing. The whole district is a gold-mine to the historical sense, a panorama to reflect on without being hastened with the thought that one will use it up. "The Belmont Book" is like no other that we know—fresh from cover to cover, full of human interest, palpitating with the joy of life. We can say nothing to indicate our opinion of it better than that, having read it through, our chief wish now is to read it through again.

Groundwork of French Composition. By Ernest Weekley, M.A. (W. B. Clive, University Tutorial Press. 2s.)

In this little volume Professor Weekley has produced an admirable work which will prove invaluable to learners of French. It is an attempt at doing for the beginner in French Prose Composition what the author's larger work on this subject tries to do for the advanced student. There is a grammatical introduction which deals particularly with those constructions which generally give most trouble to beginners. We have nothing but praise to bestow on the section "Hints on Translating English into French," which gives instances of many common words which are frequently mistranslated. The "Passages for Translation" are remarkably well chosen. They are evidently selected from the best authors, and are very varied, though history perhaps predominates amongst them. There are numerous helpful references to the grammatical portion of this extremely useful manual.

The Progress Book: an Illustrated Register of the Development of a Child from Birth until Coming of Age. By J. J. Pilley, Ph.D. (The Leadenhall Press. 1s. 6d.)

The writer says in his Preface that he has compiled this little book to serve as a simple guide for registering the more interesting facts relating to the early infancy of a child, and later as a record of physical, mental, and spiritual growth and development. The little volume is a very pretty one, bound in white with gold lettering. After birth and baptismal records have been noticed, progress up to the second birthday, with health records, may all be recorded under the headings set apart. There is an annual autograph register, spaces for holiday records, religious progress, &c. As the child advances in age more detailed references are allowed for. There are spaces for the insertion of photographs of the child from the age of two until he or she attains majority. It is a little work which home-loving mothers will be very desirous of possessing.

FICTION

STORIES WEIRD AND OTHERWISE

Uncanny Tales. By F. Marion Crawford. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

Tales of the Uneasy. By Violet Hunt. (William Heinemann. 6s.)

The Green Curve. By "Ole Luk-Oie." (William Blackwood and Sons. 1s. net.)

The stories contained in the first two works on our list will give the reader a surfeit of mystery and horror, and, to paraphrase the Ghost in "Hamlet," "will harrow up his soul, freeze his young blood, make his two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres." The third work introduces the uninitiated to the humours and horrors of modern warfare.

"Uncanny Tales."

There are seven of them, and they reveal the late Mr. Marion Crawford in a quite unfamiliar aspect. They are of uncommon vividness and power, and somewhat reminiscent of Edgar Allan Poe's weird stories. Only one, "For the Blood is the Life," has an Italian setting, the scenes of the others being laid either at sea or within the confines of the United Kingdom; but they all give the author plenty of opportunity for the display of the varied local colour of which he was such a master. The most gruesome are perhaps the two seafaring tales—"Man Overboard!" and "The Upper Berth," the latter especially.

"Tales of the Uneasy" will bring an uneasy feeling to most of those who read them. Miss Violet Hunt appears to have a lively and, at the same time, a very morbid imagination, if the paradox may be permitted. "The Prayer" rather impressed us at first, and we wondered to what mysterious climax the authoress would bring the extraordinary situation she had created; but we must confess we thought the morphia finale rather tame. There is a vein of humour running through the story entitled "The Coach," which is the Coach of Death, and the conversation between the passengers is quite enjoyable. "The Witness" is a very dramatic tale, and "The Barometer" a most pathetic one. The ninth and last tale in the volume, "The Tiger-Skin," we consider somewhat sordid and repulsive, and we think that Miss Hunt would do well to eschew such scientific subjects as Eugenics when writing short stories for general consumption.

"The Green Curve."

The author who adopts the curious pseudonym "Ole Luk-Oie," which savours alike of the land of wooden nutmegs and la belle France, writes very realistically of warfare up-to-date. This volume is made up of eleven short stories, though there is no intimation to that effect on the cover, the majority of which are naturally tragic, while a rich vein of humour runs through the others. "When Dog Eats Dog" shows how resourceful Tommy could be out in South Africa when he required firewood for culinary purposes. Other amusing incidents of the same theatre of war are related in "One Night" and "Cuvée Réservée." In "The Point of View" we learn how under the new rules a Commander-in-Chief may successfully carry through a whole campaign without once setting eyes on the enemy. "Eddy of War" depicts from both the humorous and tragic points of view what is likely to happen to London when the troops of a certain foreign Power effect a landing on our east coast. "Ole Luk-Oie's" pages are engrossing reading.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Jewess. By MULVY OUSELEY. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

MR. OUSELEY knows how to construct a plot of that kind most familiar to readers of serial stories; he knows all about the pallid brow, the steely glare, and the sinuous smile. He knows that Americans begin each sentence with the word "Say," and that moneylenders are usually financed by well-known banks. He knows that if the hero is melancholy the hero's friend should be breezy, and that if one heroine is fair and quiet the other should be dark and persuasive. With all this knowledge it is inevitable that he should write a good book, even though his dialogues are perhaps inclined to go on for half-a-dozen pages more than is strictly necessary, and his pièce de résistance in characters—a Jew moneylender of a humorous turn—is apt to forget in moments of excitement his proper German-Dutch-Cockney patois and talk in respectable English. We think Mr. Ouseley's mistake in this book is that he tries to make it in some degree a comedy of manners, for which style he is not very well fitted. He would, in our opinion, be wiser to keep to melodrama of a swift and relentless nature. We note with regret that there is only one murder in the book, and that—however, we must not give it away.

Peter's Progress. By CHRISTOPHER HEATH. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

MR. CHRISTOPHER HEATH gives us a healthy selection of Anglo-Indians, seen through a haze of unintellectual Public-Schooldom, a rather artless but pleasant tale, and three hundred and two pages of very nice and careful English. The impecunious subaltern with the peppery uncle is perhaps a very familiar character, also the blustering colonel, the captain, caddish or entirely elegant, the gallant major, the prosy old fogeys of dinner-parties, the dazzling married woman who plays so large a part in Indian social life, and last, but not least, the beautiful heroine. Peter is the subaltern, and a very nice fellow—not too slangy, we are glad to say. The caddish captain with the sleek hair is properly objectionable, the married lady is properly fascinating, and the heroine all that dreams could desire. Some of the characters are sketched quite neatly, and the local colour is not forgotten. Mr. Heath makes no pretence of having anything to say; he is merely out for a pleasant tale of debt and love and court-martial, and all is done as well as such slight things can be done.

ART

THE GOUPIL GALLERY

THE exhibition of Mr. T. E. Mostyn's pictures now open at the Goupil Gallery in Regent Street includes several interesting and beautiful things. At least one of these, "Peace," has been bought by the Manchester Art Gallery. "Peace" is not painted, however, in the manner characteristic of the majority of the paintings, and there are only about four others akin to it in the whole collection. Mr. Mostyn has called his exhibition "Romance in Colour," and the greater number of the pictures entirely justify this name. Whereas "Peace" and the few others mentioned above are painted in a flat, Whistlerian manner, the texture of the canvas showing through the paint, in the rest the colours are laid on thickly as though with the palette-knife, and the effect of the artist's use of brilliant colour in this method is a romanticism which is rather oppressive. Nothing is left to the imagination. We are told not only what we are to see, but almost what we are to think and feel. Such names as "Peace" and "Dawn" are exchanged for "The Temple of the Morning Sun," "The Domain of Arnheim," and "The Garden of Memory"—names most unfortunately reminiscent of transformation-scenes at the pantomime. Indeed, there is a good deal of the atmosphere of the theatre about them. It is not, however, the result, but the spirit of theatrical effects of which we are reminded. There is no sort of gaudiness; it is rather the aggressiveness of concentrated romance—if we may so express it. There is, however, some fine work and colour in the picture of a girl, which has also been acquired by the Manchester Gallery.

At the Modern Gallery in Bond-street there is a very interesting exhibition of the work of Mr. F. F. Ogilvie which should be visited by all who are interested in the archæology of ancient Egypt. It includes eight accurate paintings of the statues of the Pharaoh who built the Third Pyramid and of his queen, recently found by Dr. Reisner, for whom the copies were made. In addition to these there are some fifty water-colours of Egypt, which give an impression of being accurate transcripts of scenery.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

ONE of the best-known personalities of the Parisian newspaper world is M. René Puaux, who is both a journalist and a poet. Besides being a distinguished linguist, thoroughly versed in foreign literatures, and having accomplished several important voyages as a reporter for Le Temps, he has written a book of poems, "La Grille du Jardin" (Plon, Nourrit, and Co.), in which rare and subtle emotions and sentiments are expressed in delicate and refined verse. The following poem, entitled "Tendresse," especially charmed us, and it gives a good impression of M. Puaux's work:—

La tendresse une fois donnée
  Demeure et vit autour de nous.
C'est une fleur qui, moissonnée,
  Repousse et grimpe à nos genoux.

Si quelque nuit à ta fenêtre
  Tu sens passer comme des voix,
Ne tremble pas, ce sont peut-être
  Quelques tendresses d'autrefois.

Quelques tendresses oubliées
  Qui s'éveillèrent sous tes pas,
Et qui chantent, suppliciées,
  Car les tendresses n'oublient pas.

Les roses au matin fanées
  Font pourtant le soir parfumé,
Et l'amour, après des années,
  Laisse le goût d'avoir aimé.

Those who will take the trouble to read "Silhouettes Anglaises" (Librairie des Annales, 3f. 50c.), M. René Puaux's latest work, will not regret the time thus spent. Having passed two years in England as correspondent of Le Temps, M. Puaux had leisure to study closely the English personalities and peculiarities which he presents to the French public. Written in a light, vivacious, and occasionally ironical style, susceptible, however, of subtle shading according to the necessities of his subjects, these essays, or rather sketches, of many British political or artistic celebrities ought to interest readers in England, as being a very sincere reflection of a Frenchman's opinion.

M. René Puaux appears to hold in high esteem many of the leading political men of the day, though his admiration is often tempered by a satirical touch or a whimsical anec-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

dote. By a graceful courtesy, the author of "Silhouettes Anglaises" has consecrated the first of his sketches to Florence Nightingale, and, speaking of her, he quotes Longfellow's "Santa Filomena":—

> Lo! in that house of misery
> A lady with a lamp I see
> Pass through the glimmering gloom
> And flit from room to room. . . .
> A lady with a lamp shall stand
> In the great history of the land,
> A noble type of good
> Heroic womanhood.

And M. Puaux thus eloquently describes Florence Nightingale's abnegation during the Crimean War:—

> Florence Nightingale tenait au symbolisme de son nom. N'était-elle pas le doux rossignol qui chante la nuit pour le bonheur de la maison? Elle eut à lutter contre les médecins arriérés, le personnel administratif, ses propres infirmières épuisées. Elle ne connut pas d'obstacle. La vieille légende des fées bienfaisantes se renouvelait. Les blessés espéraient à nouveau en la guérison, les mourants se redressaient sur leur couche au bruit de ses pas, au son de sa voix.

M. Puaux passes from one personality to another, swiftly outlining their dominant traits, underlining occasionally their foibles, but ever rendering homage to their qualities. Speaking of Mr. Asquith, he observes that the Premier has wisely adopted for his own the motto of one of the heroes of Pierre Veber, the well-known author:—"1. Il ne faut pas compliquer sa vie; 2. Ne nous frappons pas; 3. Tout s'arrange."

Passing from the political realm to the artistic domain, the author of "Silhouettes Anglaises," in a very sober, closely-knit study, retraces the mysterious death of John Davidson. In an essay entitled "Une Enigme Littéraire" he reveals to the French public the curious double life of William Sharp, who was also "Fiona MacLeod," and who never allowed the truth to be known, even by his publishers, until after his death. M. Puaux cleverly describes what he imagines must have been the sentiments of William Sharp on seeing the works signed by him hardly noticed by the critics, while those appearing under the signature of "Fiona MacLeod" were systematically lauded by them. Aubrey Beardsley and Holman Hunt also figure in this gallery of portraits, which forms delightful reading for leisure hours. And if occasionally some of M. Puaux's opinions may not be quite in accordance with British views, his readers ought to overlook this divergence of ideas, remembering that his book has the treble merit of being witty, conscientious, and sincere.

Mme. Colette Yver's pet hobby is feminism, and the good or bad action it may have on family life or on society in general. But in her new novel, "Le Métier de Roi" (Calmann-Lévy, 3f. 50c.), she seems to have strayed from her favourite device of placing a husband and wife exercising the same profession in direct opposition one to another; and in doing so she has ventured rather beyond her depth. Her heroine, a beautiful young anarchist, who adds to her innumerable charms that of being one of the most renowned chemists of the day, begins her life by chanting the "Internationale" with conviction, and ends by singing, with a still greater vehemence, the royalist anthem of the fictitious kingdom of Lithuania.

Clara Hersberg, called to the Court of Lithuania in order to initiate the Grand Duchess Wanda into the mysteries of inorganic chemistry, becomes gradually alienated from the revolutionary cause of which she and Ismael Kozor, to whom she is engaged, were the promoters. She even becomes so conservative as to fall in love with the Sovereign Wolfram V., when she witnesses the dangers and difficulties encompassing the profession of king. Learning from Kozor that an attempt is to be made on Wolfram's life during the festivities of Wanda's marriage to Duke Bertie, she does not hesitate to denounce Ismael in order to save the monarch. The novel closes with the description of a visit which Clara makes to Wolfram, in order to obtain his permission to follow Kozor to the islet in the Pacific Ocean whither he has been banished, as she is determined to marry him, and thus expiate her treachery towards him.

"Le Métier de Roi," though containing some fine scenes, is much less interesting than Mme. Colette Yver's preceding works; the characters appear improbable; the situation seems impossible, and the whole action is disjointed. The revolutionary Ismael Kozor is weak and irresolute, a piteous specimen of his type; Clara Hersberg is unnatural by the sentiment she nourishes for the King, hereditary enemy, or at least opponent, of her and her class, and especially by the ease with which she, the ardent Nihilist, accustoms herself to Court life and ceremonials. Indeed, of all the characters presented to us in the course of this work, that of the king appears the most sympathetic and comprehensible, his special distinction being a continual striving after sincerity, a perpetual effort towards finding what really is his duty as king on earth.

In "Le Roman Français" (Louis Michaud, 2f.) M. Gabriel Clouzet has undertaken to give a résumé of the evolution of the novel in France, and he has succeeded in presenting us with an interesting compilation of the works of the most celebrated novelists, together with a short biographical and analytical notice of each. The preface, entitled "L'Histoire du Roman," by M. Charles Simond, greatly adds to the attraction of the book. M. Simond has briefly retraced the origin of the novel throughout the ages, passing from Egypt, where we find the romance of Anepou and Seti, written in the fourteenth century B.C., to Europe and the novels of Fielding, Goldsmith, Voltaire, l'Abbé Prévost and Goethe. M. Simond thus ends his entertaining preface:—

> Le Roman au XIX^e. et au XX^e. siècles sera semblable à une plaine immense où pousseront l'un à côté de l'autre toutes les cultures. Il ne sera plus possible de cataloguer tous les romanciers et leurs ouvrages. Pour en dresser l'inventaire, pour en déterminer la valeur, pour en signaler les beautés et les défauts en faisant le triage avec impartialité, une vie de Bénédictin ne suffirait pas.

M. Gabriel Clouzet relates in a very instructive study the evolution of the French novel, showing how to the idealism and asceticism of the Middle Ages succeeded a joyous and merry philosophy of life, while the really natural style of writing was only revealed in 1678 by Madame de Lafayette's celebrated romance, "La Princesse de Clèves." "It is," declares M. Clouzet, "the first analytical novel, and one may also say the first great masterpiece of the kind." The author of "Le Roman Français" shows that the eighteenth-century novel was subject to too many influences to be very definite. But he remarks that Marivaux, in his works "La Vie de Marianne" and "Le Paysan Parvenu," prepared the way for the character-novel, as his writings contain some very penetrating analytical qualities which remind one of modern psychologists.

A quite modern form of fiction is the social novel, treating of divers important public questions. The standard work of this kind is "Germinal," by Zola. But of late years numerous authors have devoted their talents towards depicting the terrible injustice of the inequality of the present conditions of life and the sufferings of the poorer classes. Amongst the strongest works of this kind, both in conception and style, are "La Vague Rouge," by J. H. Rosny, aîné; "Les Va-nu-pieds," by Léon Cladel; the vehement story of "Jacques Vingtras," by Jules Vallès;

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"L'Apprentie," by Gustave Geffroy, treating of life in the Parisian faubourgs. And in "Les Hannetons de Paris" M. Georges Lecomte has studied and described the thirst our society has for money, the fascination lucre exercises over all imaginations with the exactness of a rigorous judge. Thus M. Clouzet describes and delimits the numerous subdivisions of the "Roman Français," and we can only regret that he has thought wise to cite such short quotations from the works he deals with; for, from the extracts he gives, any one not familiar with the books mentioned would find it very difficult, if not almost impossible, to form a correct impression of the style and thought of the authors to whom he refers.

MARC LOGÉ.

THE STORY OF A BOOK

III.—THE CRITIC ERRANT

THERE are some emotions so intimate that the most intrepid writer hesitates to chronicle them lest it should be inferred that he himself is in the confessional. We have endeavoured to show our author as a level-headed Englishman with his nerves well under control and an honest contempt for emotionalism in the stronger sex; but his feelings in the face of the first little bundle of reviews sent him by the press-cutting agency would prove this portrait incomplete. He noticed with a vague astonishment that the flimsy scraps of paper were trembling in his fingers like banknotes in the hands of a gambler, and he laid them down on the breakfast-table in disgust of this feminine weakness. This unmistakable proof that he had written a book, a real book, made him at once happy and uneasy. These fragments of smudged prints were his passport into a new and delightful world; they were, it might be said, the name of his destination in the great republic of letters, and yet he hesitated to look at them. He heard of the curious blindness of authors that made it impossible for them to detect the most egregious failings in their own work, and it occurred to him that this might be his malady. Why had he published his book? He felt at that moment that he had taken too great a risk. It would have been so easy to have had it privately printed and contented himself with distributing it among his friends. But these people who were paid for writing about books, these critics who had sent Keats to his gallipots and Swinburne to his fig-tree might well have failed to have recognised that his book was sacred, because it was his own.

When he had at last achieved a fatalistic tranquillity, he once more picked up the notices, and this time he read them through carefully. The Rutlandshire Gazette quoted Shakespeare, the Thrums Times compared him with Christopher North, the Stamford-bridge Herald thought that his style resembled that of Macaulay, but they were unanimous in praising his book without reservation. It seemed to the author that he was listening to the authentic voice of fame. He rested his chin on his hand and dreamed long dreams.

He could afford in this hour of his triumph to forget the annoyances he had undergone since his book was first accepted. The publisher, with a large first edition to dispose of, had been rather more than firm with the author. He had changed the title of the book from "Earth's Returns," a title that had seemed to the author dignified and pleasantly literary, to "The Improbable Marquis," which seemed to him to mean nothing at all. Moreover, instead of giving the book a quiet and scholarly exterior, he had bound it in boards of an injudicious heliotrope, inset with a nasty little coloured picture of a young woman with a St. Bernard dog. This binding revolted the author, who objected, with some reason, that in all his book there was no mention of a dog of that description, or, indeed, of any dog at all. The book was wrapped in an outer cover that bore a recommendation of its contents, starting with a hideous split infinitive and describing it as an exquisite social comedy written from within. On the whole it seemed to the author that his book was flying false and undesirable colours, and since art lies outside the domesticities, he was hardly relieved when his wife told him that she thought the binding was very pretty. The author had shuddered no less at the little paragraphs that the publisher had inserted in the newspapers concerning his birth and education, wherein he was bracketed with other well-known writers whose careers at the University had been equally undistinguished. But now that, like Byron, he found himself famous among the bacon and eggs, he was in no mood to remember these past vexations. As soon as he had finished breakfast he withdrew himself to his study and wrote half an essay on the Republic of Letters.

In a country wherein fifteen novels—or is it fifty?—are published every day of the year the publisher's account of the goods he sells is bound to have a certain value. Money talks, as Mr. Arnold Bennett once observed—indeed to-day it is grown quite garrulous—and when a publisher spends a lot of money on advertising a book the inference is that some one believes the book to be good. This will not secure a book good notices, but it will secure it notices of some kind or other, and that, as every publisher knows, is three-quarters of the battle. The average critic to-day is an old young man who has not failed in literature or art, possibly because he has not tried to accomplish anything in either. By the time he has acquired some skill in criticism he has generally ceased to be a critic, through no fault of his own, but through sheer weariness of spirit. When a man is very young he can dance upon every one who has not written a masterpiece with a light heart, but after this period of joyous savagery there follows fatigue and a certain pity. The critic loses sight of his first magnificent standards, and becomes grateful for even the smallest merit in the books he is compelled to read. Like a mother giving a powder to her child, he is at pains to disguise his timid censure with a teaspoonful of jam. As the years pass by he becomes afraid of these books that continue to appear in unreasonable profusion, and that have long ago destroyed his faith in literature, his love of reading, his sense of humour, and the colouring matter of his hair. He realises, with a dreadful sense of the infinite, that when he is dead and buried this torrent of books will overwhelm the individualities of his successors, bound like himself to a lifelong examination of the insignificant.

Timidity is certainly the note of modern criticism, which is rarely roused to indignation save when confronted by the infrequent outrage of some intellectual anarchist. If the critics of the more important journals were not so enthusiastic as their provincial confrères, they were at least gentle with "The Improbable Marquis." A critic of genius would have said that such books were not worth writing, still less worth reading. An outspoken critic would have said that it was too dull to be an acceptable presentation of a life that we all find interesting. As it was, most of the critics praised the style in which it was written because it was quite impossible to call it an enthralling or even an entertaining book. Some of the younger critics who still retained an interest in their own personalities discovered that its vacuity made it a convenient mirror by means of which they would display the progress of their own genius. In common gratitude they had to close these manifestations of their merit, with a word or two in praise of the book they were professing to review. "The Improbable Marquis" was very favourably received by the Press in general.

It was, as the publisher made haste to point out in his advertisements, a book of the year, and, reassured by its flippant exterior, the libraries and the public bought it with avidity. The author pasted his swollen collection of newspaper-cuttings into an album, and carefully revised his novel in case a second edition should be called for. There was one review which he had read more often than any of the others, and nevertheless he hesitated to include it in his collection. "This book," wrote the anonymous reviewer, "is as nearly faultless as a book may be that possesses no positive merit. It differs only from seven-eighths of the novels that are produced to-day in being more carefully written. The author had nothing to say, and he has said it." That was all, three malignant lines in a paper of no commercial importance, the sort of thing that was passed round the publisher's office with an appreciative chuckle. In the face of the general amiability of the Press, such a notice in an obscure journal could do the book no harm.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Only the author sat hour after hour in his study with that diminutive scrap of paper before him on the table, and wondered if it was true.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

A LOATHSOME BOOK

WE have by chance come across a copy of this book,* which has been brought out altogether surreptitiously, without any indication whatever of the names of the author, publisher, or place of issue, whether in England or India. It is no mere pamphlet, but a book of small octavo size, of 444 pages, well-printed, bound in a bright red paper cover, the colour being doubtless selected to attract attention and to convey some idea of the truculent character of the contents. It purports to be a translation, made speedily by several hands, of a work originally written in an Indian vernacular, of which the name is also concealed. It claims also to have been translated at the urgent solicitation of many persons, with the express object that, when retranslated into the other vernaculars, it might be read by the whole Indian nation—mark the word—as the history of the War of Independence. We would fain hope that there are not many persons who could have brought themselves to write such a book, and it contains so much evidence of ability and wide reading in its composition that the list of possible authors is further limited. But in the absence of any means of proof it would not be fair to attribute its authorship to any individual, though the strongest suspicions may point to certain persons.

It is without exception the most mischievous—indeed, most wicked—book we have ever seen, and we have no intention of sullying our pages by quoting from it. Our object in referring to it at all is twofold—to warn any one who may see it of the general nature of its contents, and to inform the public of the reality of the conspiracy against British rule in India, which this book is obviously intended to propagate. Fortunately the Government in India has the legal power, under a recent Press Act, of seizing and suppressing copies of such a publication, and on inquiry we believe that the power has been exercised in this case. But there is no saying how many copies may not have been smuggled into India, or been disseminated there before the attention of the Executive, police, and Customs authorities was attracted to it, or how many may be available there for being circulated, or read aloud, or retranslated into obscure vernaculars, in particular passages or in extenso.

The object of the author is clearly to incite the Indian readers to rebellion by showing how far it succeeded in 1857, and to encourage a repetition of the murders and massacres of the British which were then perpetrated. The Mutiny and mutineers are termed the Revolution and revolutionaries. The real causes and motives are said to be, not the fear of greased cartridges and the annexation of Oudh, but the principles of Swadharma and Swaraj, meaning, according to the glossary attached, "one's own duty or religion" and "independent self-government." The official explanation is scouted that the Mutiny was a military revolt; the author treats it as a popular rising, justified by the iniquities of British rule and political slavery, and the demand for vengeance and liberty. He magnifies and invents objectionable matter on the British side, and minimises or omits atrocious acts of the "revolutionaries." Their leaders, including those who have been branded with infamy for their treachery, cruelty, and massacres, are fulsomely belauded as heroes and patriots, while the British authorities are everywhere disparaged and vilified. Where defeat must be acknowledged failures are attributed to want of constructive power, and to the treachery to the rebel cause of those who, like the Sikhs and Nepalese, stood faithful to the British. The extermination of the Feringhis (an opprobrious term for the British) is indirectly advocated; the possibility of the reopening of the volcano is more than hinted at. This is the truest word in this loathsome book; the British in India live on a volcano, which is always smouldering rather than exhausted.

* The Indian War of Independence of 1857. By an INDIAN NATIONALIST.

THE PLIGHT OF PORTUGAL*

By W. H. KOEBEL

A PORTUGESE author, Mr. V. de Bragança Cunha, has just published a work on the history of the Portuguese Monarchy. The book is in most respects a commendable one. It renders in a conscientious fashion the story of the long chain of kings that began before the curved scimitar of the Moor was driven out of the land, and that ended——when the past and future tenses have so many opportunities of becoming entangled it is best to leave the ending still unsaid!

There is little to comment upon in the earlier pages of this book. The author follows the entrancingly interesting historical thread of the mediæval and later ages with a pleasing clearness of insight and with the impartial judgment that follows a lengthy lapse of years. So much, at all events, was to be expected and hoped for. What is really surprising, and what I, for one, had not in the least expected to find, is that this same impartiality and mental detachment is continued through the era of the present day to the end of the final chapter.

Now politics have of late become part of the very marrow of the average Portuguese. Therefore, even on the part of the most able and impassioned historian there must be some potent reason for this unnaturally calm sifting of facts that are wont to inflame the minds of those who approach them in an alleged judicial spirit. When great issues are pending it is in the power of very few to distribute nicely balanced doses of blame and justification on all hands, regardless of the heavy storm-clouds above.

It is precisely this that our Portuguese author has done. We may not find ourselves in entire agreement with all his views, but none can deny that, according to his lights, he has dealt out strict justice to each party and faction. He has, as it were, collected the vices and virtues of the past

* Eight Centuries of Portuguese Monarchy. By V. DE BRAGANÇA CUNHA. (Stephen Swift. 15s. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

two generations, sorted them with rather weary care, and has given out the result with a sigh. It is the note of despair that reveals the tenour of the book. Every page, in fact, breathes a spirit of hopelessness so deep as to make even the present appear as of little account beside the fatal and unalterable deeds of the past.

Mr. de Bragança Cunha is himself a Portuguese, and therefore should know. Nevertheless it is not invariably the Portuguese who have proved themselves the ablest prophets of their own destiny. A tired nation, as well as a man, may have its fits of political indigestion, when the black outlook is altogether unsilvered. Ere attempting to arrive at a perhaps less unchequered view of the present situation it would be as well to take a very rapid survey of what has gone before.

In the course of her history six crises have shaken Portugal even more deeply and dramatically than the loss of her colonies, since the latter was the result of a more gradual process. The crushing defeat by the Moors at Alcacer Quibir was the first of these shattering events. Then, the loss of her King and of ten thousand men, the flower of the nation's chivalry, sent Portugal beneath the dominion of Spain for eighty years. In 1755, rather more than a century after the regaining of her independence, came the great earthquake that upheaved commercial prosperity as well as bricks and mortar. The Peninsula campaign, and the Miguelite civil wars that followed; the financial paralysis brought about in 1890 by the misunderstanding with England; the murder of Dom Carlos, that formed the prelude to the recent revolution—these complete the half-dozen of these chief tragedies.

It is necessary to introduce this catalogue of disaster for the purpose of a comparison of the past with the present. Such a comparison has more than a mere abstract value just now. At the conclusion of each of the first five crises the material condition of Portugal was more lamentable and depressing than is at present the case. Yet in each instance the nation has displayed an astonishing recuperative power. In each instance it has climbed again the rungs of the ladder of prosperity, until the next catastrophe sent it to the bottom again.

There is, however, a distinction between the present crisis and those of history that must be borne very clearly in mind. In every one of the previous periods of recuperation Portugal has had before it an ideal upon which to fix its eyes, and a personality in which that ideal was represented and centred. At times this one in the forefront strode forward of his own initiative; at others he was insensibly propelled from beneath. It did not much matter which. The symbol was there, to go or be pushed, and the progress continued. Putting aside for the moment its human incarnation, where is the ideal now? The majority of educated Portuguese will tell you with perfect frankness that they have become completely fogged on the point, and an Iberian nation without an ideal is a rudderless ship indeed.

It is precisely on this account that the country is weighed down beneath an atmosphere of unrest and a conviction of many changes to come. Far be it from me to decry unfairly the efforts of those who seized the helm of State. But the best of intentions are slippery things in untried hands. Human limitations permit the ordinary person to judge all matters, Governments included, by results alone. The present régime promised the millennium, and the promise when it was made was largely believed by the ingenuous peasantry. The millennium was not in being at the time: it had to be made. And what has been the constructive policy of this latest form of Portuguese statesmanship? It has curtailed the liberties of the citizens; it has retired in disorder before a sudden great outbreak of strikes strangely inappropriate to the millennium. But in return it has framed a new code of divorce law that throws open the alluring fields of free love.

In defence it may be urged, with a certain amount of reason, that unrepressed political discontent is fatal to the welfare of the State; that to intervene in strike disorders might fan a larger flame of riot, and that the shuffling together and redealing of husbands and wives is an enlightened tribute to the rational spirit of the age. But as remedies for the condition of Portugal these do not suffice. Political and social experiments, utopian dreams, are luxuries for none but the most stable moments of a stolid nation. Applied to a highly-wrought race whose nerve is suffering from a vital shock they are as effectual and as enduring as a coat of gaudy paint smeared on red-hot embers.

It is easy, of course, to criticise actions undertaken in difficult circumstances. Indeed, had not the movement been ushered in with such confident pomp and proclamation much of the existing ground for criticism would never have arisen, since a more modest programme would have brought about a lesser dillusion. It is instructive to follow the salient points on which the late struggle was nominally fought. Questions of finance and the alleged influence of the priests were the trump-cards in the hands of the erstwhile malcontents. Now there is not a man familiar with the inner workings of the treasury who does not know that upon the Crown was foisted the entire responsibility for financial extravagances, by far the greater part of which lay actually at the doors of others. The statement that the country writhed beneath the heel of the priests cannot bear investigation for a single moment. Clerical influence had declined to a point not readily understood by those who still associate Portugal with the reign of the Inquisition. Priests were mobbed and chased in the streets of Lisbon—I was present just after the occasion—long before the murder of Dom Carlos. In the face of this one plain incident how is it possible to maintain the fiction of priestly dominion? If any terror remained, it was decidedly not on the side of the laymen.

Joao Franco, the Minister, is popularly held to be responsible to no small degree for the death of Dom Carlos, and for the confusion that has resulted in the establishment of a republic. There is no doubt that Franco went too far in disciplinary methods, and too fast in theory. Yet his aim was the financial cleansing of the State. It was this Minister, who faced the position squarely and who endeavoured to institute fundamental reform, who aroused the bitter hatred of so many politicians of doubtful integrity. The bald truth is that those who were responsible for the death of the King were actuated by no desire for reform. On the contrary, they were the tools of those who, when reform was actually on the way, found the first steps of the phase inconvenient to their perquisites and pockets.

The whole world is familiar with the various chapters of the sequel. Now that the new régime has held power for the better part of a year it has become sadly evident that in the midst of the chaos is struggling a nation that is hydra-headed, but numb in body. Once endowed with a compact head, there is no doubt that the body will become animate again. For this body, which consists of the people of Portugal, is made up of busy, honest, and very ingenuous folk, who till their plots of land in the north, labour in the southern cork forests, and cultivate the vineyards and fields throughout the land.

They are folk of whom we hear remarkably little just now. The political feuds, abstruse problems, and the louder mouths of Lisbon and Oporto have drawn attention to themselves at the expense of all else. Yet the vitality of the great mass of the nation—the agricultural population—remains as unimpaired as ever. Just now the countrymen are asking for nothing beyond intelligent guidance and the firmness of a practical leader. Under such auspices they have come forward often enough to the rescue of their country in the past, and it is at their hands now that the ultimate salvation of Portugal is undoubtedly to be looked for. It is here that lies the brighter side of the Portuguese picture.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE THEATRE

THE COURT THEATRE

The Irish Players

It was quaint on Monday, the 12th inst., to hear Molière delivered in an Irish brogue. Lady Gregory's translation of the master of pure comedy into the cadence and phrase of West of Ireland speech has already been reviewed in these columns. It reads quaintly enough; yet, to be true, its acting was twice as quaint. There were some among the audience, chiefly among the Irish, who declared their dissatisfaction by leaving the theatre; but the mass of the audience, very rightly, rose to the strange and quite inimitable joy of the moment. The play chosen was, obviously, "Les Fourberies de Scapin." We say obviously with deliberation, for in reviewing the Kiltartan Molière some time ago we pointed out that the broad humour of Scapin came far more aptly to the new cadence than "La Misère" or "Le Médecin Malgré Lui." And what we said then with regard to the reading must be added to emphatically with reference to the acting; for Molière spoken in rich and musical language, and associated with none of the conventions that are associated with his productions in French, is a new and complete delight.

This is a day when lavish praise is habitually expended on the unworthy, and when, therefore, the excellent is received with reserve and restriction in order to emphasise the distinction between them. It is an unhappy inversion. Departing from it now, a warmth of praise must be accorded to Mr. Arthur Sinclair as Scapin. We have already had occasion to refer to the splendid comedy powers of this really fine actor; but in "Les Fourberies de Scapin" it is not too much to say that the play is himself, and that he is the play In no one point does he fail to swell out the humour of Scapin to the full; and yet he never once exaggerated.

The same night there was given Synge's "In the Shadow of the Glen." Not altogether do we agree with Miss Maire O'Neill's interpretation of the part of Nora Burke. Very rightly she has laid emphasis on the hardness of Nora's disposition; but we would draw her attention to the fact that there is something more than hardness mixed up in her character. It was no merely hard woman who said: "For what good is a bit of farm with cows on it, and sheep on the back hills, when you do be sitting looking out for a door the like of that door, and seeing nothing but the mists rolling down the bog, and the mists again, and they rolling up the bog, and hearing nothing but the wind crying out in the bits of broken trees which were left from the great storm, and the streams roaring with the rain." She who spoke thus was a woman with the great hunger of loneliness in her soul; and there is a passage in one of Synge's Wicklow Sketches that link with this to substantiate what we say. This phase of Nora's character Miss O'Neill is somewhat too apt to neglect. Nevertheless, the performance was a haunting one. It was played gravely, at least, more gravely than was "The Playboy," to its unutterable advantage. For we do not want to make farce out of so great a soul as J. M. Synge.

On Wednesday was given the first production in London of "The Casting Out of Martin Whelan," a play in three Acts by R. J. Ray. It was a strange and puzzling performance. Full of many fine moments as it was, and with a central idea that was well conceived, we had seldom seen any play that failed as this did. That the conclusion was weak was one thing; but it was far more than weak; in its very weakness it puzzled and perplexed, as though it had narrowly, however absolutely, missed excellence. A touch of artificiality not often given by the Irish Players was accorded by the fact that the time is announced on the programme as "twenty years ago." There are truly only two kinds of drama: that which deals with some phase of contemporary life, and which is therefore but transient and impermanent; and that which deals with primal emotions, whether caught in contemporary life or, more preferably, set in idle and timeless conditions, and which, if justly dealt with, is therefore a joy for ever. But to catch back a way of regarding life which is historic and neither contemporary or primal is to halt on the threshold of that decision of outlook without which drama cannot exist.

This fault is the first thing that mars "The Casting Out of Martin Whelan." Martin Whelan, be it said, was an Australian-born Irishman, who had returned to Ireland in order to resume his intimacy with the country and, if it may be, to stand for Parliamentary membership. But the people are mostly suspicious of him; they do not know whether to return his cordiality or to resent his gentility. Moreover, he has struck up great friendship with Peter Barton's daughter Ellen, who has won herself to education, culture, and a certain breadth of outlook, and who is therefore also regarded askance. This is not only in itself an emphasis of his superiority, but it also stirs the enmity of Mrs. Kirby, who has destined Ellen for her son. Then the news was spread abroad that Martin Whelan's mother was the daughter of a man who had turned informer; and any one who knows Ireland (especially "twenty years ago") will not need to be told of the enmity with which an informer's blood is regarded. At once the whole town turns against Martin. The scene in which he demands to know the cause of this sudden coldness, in the club which he himself has aided or established, has a true dramatic grip, and is excellently rendered by Mr. O'Donovan, with Miss Sara Allgood and Mr. Sinclair in opposition.

But now the whole play goes to pieces. A climax has obviously been worked for; and one looks to see whence it will arrive. It never arrives. Peter Barton has forbidden Martin his house. He comes, nevertheless, and wins a promise from Ellen to be his wife. Then, as the curtain comes down on old Peter Barton in fierce anger against his daughter, we are left gasping—expecting more; and wondering. The latter portion has evidently been rewritten too; for early in Martin's talk with Ellen she seems undeniably to be shaping for a refusal of him, and a justification of some kind of her neighbours. Rewritten or not rewritten, however, it is a failure, and a disappointing failure, for much in it was very fine.

On the following evening came "Harvest," by Mr. Lennox Robinson; and it did not take long to discover that the author had a very sceptical, if not a very cynical, regard towards those things that the ordinary Irish dramatist cherishes. In country faith and innocence he has little hope; and at education he openly scoffs. Indeed, it would be difficult to find in what he does believe—a state of mind it is to be hoped he will outgrow with a little more experience of life. Indeed, there are evidences enough throughout the play that Mr. Robinson's experience of life has been very superficial. For example, Colonel's daughters may on occasion marry assistants in chemists' shops: they may also talk of getting back to the land; similarly they may idolise their lowly husband's father, who happens to be a rough, untutored farmer. They may do one of these things; but not often. They might even rise to all of them. But if this be so, then one may be sure that they are very much in love indeed, whereas Mildred Hurley, as interpreted by Miss Kathleen O'Brien, is a very cool and uninfatuated young lady. Partly this was the acting, for Miss O'Brien was very "stagey," which in a company that studies simplicity appeared very ill indeed, but it was also the play.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The story itself is a hackneyed one, and hackneyed in a sophisticated way that one little expects among these players. It was very obviously written for Miss Maire O'Neill (another indication, this, resonant of West London), who, as Mary Hurley, was a farmer's daughter who had fallen into a life of dubious repute in the wicked city of London, and whose earnings in this direction afford an opportune aid to her distressed old father. This would be very touching, except that Mr. Robinson has determined that it shall not be so. Timothy Hurley is himself displayed as of very questionable morality—although one finds it difficult altogether to understand everybody's smug horror at his criminality, which consists of the rather merry prank of burning an old outhouse, and claiming compensation for it. But the erring daughter arrives home the day after the fire. This was also the day on which the chemist son brought home his high-born wife; and so every one had an opportunity of discovering how wicked every one else was. Every one, that is to say, except the old schoolmaster, Patrick Lordan, who nurses his soul, as the curtain rings down, in innocency at having educated his family to the necessary fitness for distinction: and over whom we catch a very perceptible sneer on the part of the author. We must say we rather liked the criminal father; and we certainly were drawn towards the farmer son, for all his duplicity. Perhaps in the latter case this was because of the violent expletives he cast about so freely and so fiercely. Perhaps it was because they were so truly and excellently acted by Messrs. O'Rourke and Kerrigan. Needless to say, Miss O'Neill was good; but she should beware of stage self-consciousness. Even when depicting a part of shadowed purity she should be careful not to seek "limelight." "Limelight" ruins acting. An earnest and admirable rendering was given by Miss O'Doherty as Bridget Twomey, the farmer's son's betrothed.

On the same evening one of Lady Gregory's newer plays, "Full Moon," was presented. No doubt Lady Gregory was seeking to work out a symbolical idea in the early manner of Maeterlinck. It was not successful, however. There was nothing in it of the same value that she gave us in her "Seven Short Plays."

But why all these "curtains"? Have these admirable players fallen so low as to smirk for the plaudit of habit and custom? Having witnessed, say, the supreme conclusion of "Birthright," what could be more terrible than to have that splendid vision ruthlessly destroyed by the sight of four made-up actors bowing to the comfortable plaudit of the stalls? We look to these Irish players for earnest preoccupation with themselves and their play, and a complete disregard of the audience. If they fall from that, then we shall to have return to the average West-end theatre to see the thing done properly, and not mimicked. But let them not disappoint us.

"DOMBEY AND SON."

Mr. Robert Arthur, who did so well at the Coronet Theatre by producing a series of Albery revivals last year, has just put on the stage of the Savoy Theatre a new version of "Dombey and Son." This, by Mr. Metcalfe Wood, is the only dramatisation of Dickens's book that we have seen, and it seemed to us to be workmanlike and excellent. In taking such a book as "Dombey and Son," with its quite amazing number of characters and side issues, and a story which is spread rather thinly over a long period of time, Mr. Wood set himself a by no means easy and perhaps not very grateful task in trying to make a play of it. By being extremely plucky, and by following the one dramatic main stream of the story, Mr. Wood has made a play which is interesting, amusing and, once or twice, exciting. He has also caught the atmosphere of the Dickens period extremely cleverly, and collected together, by an able piece of dramatic carpentry, many of the unforgettable although over-elaborated characters or caricatures of the book.

Mr. Wood calls the play "Dombey and Son" naturally enough. He has been wise enough, however, to ring up the curtain after the death of the son. The whole action of this version is round Dombey and wife—the second wife, Edith Skewton. We find her a cold-blooded, beautiful woman, no longer in the first flush of youth, entering into an engagement with the insufferable Dombey because she is sick of being hawked by her deplorable little mother, and is only too ready to sacrifice herself in order to gain ease of mind, money, and some sort of position. The first Act moves slowly. Very little more happens in it than the introduction of the chief characters, and J. B., Walter, Carker, Florence, and Susan Nipper. All these are delightfully brought to life by Mr. Louis Calvert, Mr. Frederic Worlock, a young actor of great ability and a very pleasing appearance, Mr. Frank Randell, Miss Marjorie Chard, and Miss Dulcie Greatwich. Of Dombey, Edith, and Mrs. Skewton we will speak later. The second Act gives us an evening reception at Dombey's house a year later. Edith is his wife, or, more truthfully, she is legally known as Mrs. Dombey. It is impossible to conceive any sort of domestic life in such a house or any intimacy between such a man and woman. Already, in fact, Dombey is far from satisfied with the result of his bargain. Edith spends his money, scoffs at his friends, treats him exactly as though he were a sort of drum-major stick, and goes her own way. Carker is at work, with his gleaming smile, and Edith's spirit of revolt makes her colder and more aloof than ever. Into this house which is so very much out of order come Lord Feenix, admirably and most sympathetically played by Mr. O. B. Clarence, Mrs. Louisa Chick, realised to perfection by Miss Emily Fitzroy, the Blimbers, Feeder, B.A., Sir Barnet, Lady and Miss Skettles, Mr. Parker, Lady and the Misses Peps, the Rev. Alfred Feeder, and Mr. Toots. As the last-named, Mr. Evelyn Beerbohm was altogether beyond praise. Nothing happens again except a very amusing series of "turns," in which sets of these people take part. With their departure the play starts. There is a most dramatic fracas between the Dombeys, with Carker as the go-between, which ends with Edith flinging her diamonds at her husband's feet and herself out of the room.

The third Act takes us to the Hotel in Dijon, to which Edith has lured Carker for two purposes—the first to disgrace her husband, and the second to make the man with the white teeth smile on the other side of his face. It is a good Act. It moves rapidly, and when we know that Edith has herself been the means of letting Dombey know that she is at the hotel as Mrs. Carker, we prepare for explosions. In a fine, quiet scene Edith lays her cards on the table, one by one, and as each one goes down, face upwards, Carker's intense satisfaction leaks out, drop by drop. Finally, when he realises that he has been completely misled and fooled, he blusters and plays the blackguard without any attempt at disguise. He believes that he has Edith alone in an annexe of the hotel. He guards the door, and, regaining some of his old satisfaction, becomes familiar, as such a peptonised cad would do. All the time the beautiful, curious woman backs slowly, and with characteristic dignity, to a door of which Carker knows nothing, but which leads out into the courtyard. Carker suspects, makes a dash forwards, springs at the door, through which the woman whom he desires has disappeared like a flash, and finds it locked. Steps and voices are heard on the stairs. J. B. flings open the door. He is followed by Dombey, a trembling, livid man. Carker, disgraced and humiliated, and, worst of all, found out, throws himself out of window, and down comes the curtain. It is, of course, rank melodrama. Nevertheless, it is effective and powerful, and goes with a swing. It brought the house down.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The next Act is placed in Florence's new home in London, a matter of two years later. She is married to Walter Gay, and is the proud possessor of a baby. Dombey, broken in health and fortune, is ekeing out a miserable existence upstairs, seeing no one except his daughter, speaking very little to her. Little Lord Feenix and bluff old J. B. enter, and then follows a delightful comedy scene, played by Mr. Clarence and Mr. Calvert in the best ripe old-fashioned manner. These two old persons have come on a mysterious mission, bringing with them some one who has been very kind to Florence. It proves to be Mrs. Dombey. Her entrance brings about a very moving little scene, and ends with the unhappy, dissatisfied, unawakened woman leaving in the girl's hands a letter, in which the whole story of the Dijon episode is made clear—a letter which Florence will presently give to the wreck of a man who sits upstairs, chewing the cud of bitterness and perhaps remorse.

From this rough sketch of the story it will be seen that the greater portion of the novel has gone by the board, together with Cap'n Cuttle and a whole host of other characters who have taken a place in the daily life of whole-hearted Dickensians. For all that, this new version presents a series of amusing, interesting, and dramatic pictures, and the whole is very well worth seeing. The scenery and furniture have been carefully, even tenderly, prepared. The dresses are accurate and good, and the acting all round is quite admirable. The Dombey of Mr. Clifton Alderson is excellent: the rasping voice, the dull, heavy face, the pompous manner are all there. Miss Sidney Farebrother is Mrs. Skewton to the life. There remains Miss Evelyn Millard as Edith Dombey. Miss Millard has never done anything so well as this part. She looks extremely beautiful and as cold as ice. In all her quiet, intense moments she holds our attention and wins our sympathy. It is when she is called upon to give an outburst of hysterical indignation, to lose the self-control she has done her utmost for so many horrid weeks to preserve, that Miss Millard fails. Then her voice becomes shrill and hollow and insincere, and she acts. We are, however, grateful to Miss Millard for the greater part of her performance, and to Mr. Robert Arthur for his temerity and enterprise in producing the play. He deserves success and we trust that he will win it. A more admirable, all-round company cannot be found in any other London theatre except the little one in the Adelphi.

"OLAF LILIEKRANS" AT THE REHEARSAL THEATRE

Thanks to the enterprise of the Ibsen Club, "Olaf Liliekrans," one of Ibsen's earliest poetic plays, was presented before a full house at the Rehearsal Theatre on Sunday evening last, for the first time in England. Naturally the occasion was one of exceptional interest. The Ibsen of the later days, of the critical frown and the stormy mind, was absent; in his place we seemed to see a youth with dreamy eyes, his soul steeped in the quaint legends of the North-land, striving to set before his listeners the sunny, showery landscape of an April morning instead of the sombre closing of a November twilight. Now and then a gust of cynicism brought to mind the dramatist of "Hedda Gabler" and "Ghosts," but the play sped on to its close impelled by the spirit of hope and youth.

Olaf, betrothed to Ingeborg, is bewitched by Alfhild, a beautiful girl of the mountains and woods, half human, half fairy. Ingeborg (Miss Catherine Robertson) is loved by Hemming, henchman to Arne fra Guldvik, her father; and her scenes of charming coquettishness with the puzzled Hemming were fine comedy. The game of cross-purposes proceeds, at times coming perilously near to tragedy, until at last the lovers find their true mates and the happy ending ensues. This happy ending, by the way, comes too swiftly and violently to be either natural or artistic; the machinery seems to jar slightly; the steam is turned on too suddenly, if we may use such a metaphor; everybody is reconciled with such haste that one imagines the author tired of his play. With this reservation, the play is one of strong poetic beauty, and it was interpreted, at any rate by the principal characters, in a way which left little to be desired. Mr. Townley Searle as Arne fra Guldvik would have been much more impressive had he spoken less rapidly; his words flowed forth at a tremendous rate, and the effect of some sentences was lost; but he brought out the humorous touches of his part delightfully. To Miss Pax Robertson must go the honours. As Alfhild, the mountain-maiden, she was charming; she excels in the art of graceful gesture, and her scenes with Olaf, where she has in turn to express love, mystification, and despair, exemplified acting of a very high order. Mr. Valentine Penna as Olaf, bewildered by his own mental state, desperate with longing for the mysterious Alfhild, conveyed the difficult character well, and his outburst in the second Act thrilled the audience. The part of Dame Kirsten Liliekrans, Olaf's mother, was excellently taken by Miss Gladys Jones, and Mr. Ned Llewelyn pourtrayed Hemming satisfactorily.

The play has been translated by Miss C. A. Arfwedson, as far as one can judge, in a most capable and comprehending manner, and at the close she responded to an enthusiastic call. We note that on Thursday, June 29th, Miss Arfwedson will lecture on "Ibsen as a Lover," at The Studio, 65A, Long Acre.

MOTORING AND AVIATION

The large and constantly increasing number of British motorists who appreciate the delights of Continental touring will note with satisfaction that all legal speed-limits for motor-cars are to be abolished in France. According to the well-informed Paris correspondent of the Motor, the plenary Commission charged with the drawing up of the new French road code has not only arrived at this decision, but has also decreed that the objectionable practice of issuing a summons without having given any notification at the time of the alleged offence is to be entirely prohibited. Hitherto, country policemen in France have been permitted to take the number of a car as it was running by, without making any attempt to stop it, taking out a summons later for exceeding the speed-limit. As might be expected, the enlightened common sense of the French nation as a whole has militated against any general or harsh enforcement of either this regulation or that of the speed-limit, but it is just as well that they should both be finally removed from the Statute-book. The result of the experiment, so far as the abolition of all speed restrictions is concerned, will be watched with interest in this country, where there is much difference of opinion as to the advisability or otherwise of imposing a legal limit. No unbiassed person can contend that our own system, with its undignified police "traps" and its arbitrarily-imposed fines, is satisfactory; and it is difficult to see how either of these objectionable features is to be dispensed with so long as there is to be any attempt to enforce a legal speed limit. But, on the other hand, the scorcher is still sufficiently in evidence among us to make one speculate as to what would be the result of the removal of all restrictions on speed in this country.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

One of the noteworthy features of the development of the motor industry during the last few years has been the success which attended the policy adopted by several firms of concentrating upon the production and perfecting of one or two models of chassis, instead of manufacturing half a dozen or more of different types and powers. This has been especially exemplified in the case of Rolls-Royce, Ltd., the makers of the car which is now almost universally admitted to represent the highest degree of perfection hitherto attained in automobile design and construction. It is some four or five years since the directors of the company decided to confine themselves entirely to the manufacture of one model exclusively—six-cylinder, 40-50h.p.—and to this policy they have consistently adhered, with the result that no motor manufacturing concern in the country can point to a record of more continuous prosperity, and no car in the world has a higher reputation than the Rolls-Royce. In fact, for a long time past the output capacity of the big works in Derby has been quite inadequate to cope with the demand which has arisen both here and on the Continent for this famous British car; hence the recent formation of a French company, under the title of Automobiles Rolls-Royce, Ltd. (France), for the purpose of increasing the manufacturing facilities and dealing with the Continental demand. The new company acquires the right to make chassis similar to those now produced at Derby, and to sell them in any European country outside the United Kingdom under the name of Rolls-Royce, but the British company is represented by a majority on the board of directors and will, consequently, be in a position to direct its policy and ensure the maintenance of the high standard of excellence which has given the Rolls-Royce its commanding position in the automobile world.

For the European Aviation Circuit Race—Paris, Berlin, Brussels, London, Paris—forty entries have been received. It will consist of nine stages, with a day's interval for rest between each. In connection with the work of marking the course to be taken by the competitors in the English portion of the circuit, the organisers have enlisted the assistance of the Automobile Association and Motor Union, the route chosen being from Dover to Shoreham and from Shoreham to Hendon. The course will be marked by a series of large white arrows, 72ft. in length by 12ft. in width, placed at intervals on the ground in conspicuous places, smaller arrows being used intermediately. Captive balloons are also being utilised at certain points along the route. The whole course has been inspected by the Automobile Association and Motor Union Aviation Section, and the work of marking has been carried out with the thoroughness characteristic of the Association.

The "Automobile Association and Motor Union Handbook for 1911," which has just been issued, is the first to make its appearance since the amalgamation of the two great national motoring organisations. It is only issued to members, and its object is to acquaint them with all the advantages and facilities existing for their benefit, and to furnish them in the most concise and lucid form possible with legal and general information of value to them as motorists. The legal section has undergone considerable revision since the 1910 edition was issued, and now forms a very useful and up-to-date summary of the motorist's numerous obligations, couched in clear and non-technical language. In order to retain the compactness of the work, the touring section, which was included in last year's Handbook, has been omitted from the present edition, a separate "Foreign Handbook," containing much additional foreign touring information, being now issued.

Two publications come to us from the London Motor Garage Co., Ltd., of Wardour-street, W., the representatives for Great Britain of the Charron car. One is their "Road-Atlas of Great Britain"—a handy little work which is specially to be commended for its lucidity and freedom from the mass of superfluous detail which spoils so many more pretentious publications of a similar nature. All the main roads of the kingdom are shown with the utmost clearness, and, in addition, the little book contains 150 selected routes in England, Wales, and Scotland, showing the intermediate mileages from town to town. The other publication is the Company's Tyre List for the present season. The London Motor Garage Co. are probably the largest retailers of motor tyres in the country, and one notes that prices are quoted for every well-known make and for all sizes. The list also contains some concise and really valuable hints on the selection, inflation, and care of tyres generally, those on the subject of correct inflation being particularly worth attention. A copy can be had post-free by any motorist on application to the company at the address mentioned.

MUSIC

Those are always pathetic moments when it has to be admitted that great artists, tried favourites and almost friends (though we never may have had the pleasure of speaking to them), are no longer what they once were. We are almost impatient with ourselves for our thoughts about their performance, and try to deceive ourselves into the belief that it is only some temporary cloud which is obscuring their light, or that the fault lies in us—that we are become hypercritical, or are not in the right mood to be properly impressed. We take refuge in the pleasures of memory, and live again through those hours when the brilliant artist educated as well as charmed us; we give free indulgence to our best feelings of gratitude for the enjoyments of the past, but presently we are forced to confess the truth. The coming on to the platform or stage of such and such an artist causes us no delightful, expectant thrill. Rather it brings a sense of painful anxiety, and when the performance is over all we can truthfully say is that it might have been worse. How hard it seems that this artist, who after years of continual study and unrelaxed effort, who after struggles, it may be, and disappointments, achieved and held so long a firm place in public favour, should now have to retire in favour of younger musicians. Of course it is inevitable, and wise persons would tell us not to worry about the fate of artists who have had their day, but to get the best we can from their successors. But people who truly love music often have more sympathy than practical wisdom in their natures, and they may be permitted to feel a keen regret when they are obliged to say of a favourite artist's performance, "We can no longer take any pleasure in it."

One is not conscious, however, of these kindly sentiments when there is no apparent justification for the failure of an artist's powers. We may be very sorry that M. Jean de Reszke and Signor Caruso (if the rumours about that great tenor are true) can sing no longer, because some affection of the vocal chords which surgical skill cannot remedy has menaced them, but had they begun to sing badly when at what should have been the height of their career we should have been indignant rather than pitying. Now it certainly does happen that some artists lose their sense of style, come to depend on mannerisms and exaggerations, introduce common effects and tricks, and, in the case of vocalists, sometimes get uncertain in their intonation, when there is no apparent reason for it all, unless it is that success has spoiled them and made them careless, that they have withdrawn themselves from the wholesome discipline of fine criticism, and become a law unto themselves. How often have we heard French people (and not only French people) declare that when an actor leaves the Paris theatre and tours triumphantly among audiences who have not been trained to know what the best acting is deterioration is sure to set in in that actor's style! Are not some of the highly-educated Russians telling us at this moment that the great dancers who delight us so much are no longer the perfect artists they were when they danced only in St. Petersburg, environed and shielded by the fine traditions of the Opera House there? It would seem that "world tours" have done their art no little harm, and there are not a few English and French critics who say the same thing.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We heard the other day, and were even sorry to hear, an artist who once had an almost unequalled power to delight us, Mme. Yvette Guilbert. She ought to be just as artistic as ever, but is she? The personal charm is no doubt still there, and a very great deal of the old skill. But have not the little tricks which used to be so delicate, the refinements of style which told just enough of the story and left to the imagination just what ought to be left, have not these become exaggerated and coarsened? Among the fifteen songs which Mme. Guilbert sang to illustrate fifteen types of women were several we have heard her sing over and over again in years past, and now, alas! the thing was overdone, over-accentuated, in some cases it was nearly spoiled. Though sincerely distressed to find ourselves so much disappointed, we could not feel the sorrow we should have felt had old age and weariness overtaken Mme. Guilbert and diminished her powers. Once she was a very great artist. We are afraid that she is not now so great as she was, though undoubtedly she still could be did she so choose.

Another singer who has grieved us lately in the same sort of way is that splendid artist Mme. Julia Culp, to whose singing it used to be sheer delight to listen a year or two ago. At her last recital, though she was in good voice, she was by no means always perfect in tune; she seemed careless about the tone of her middle notes, and, what was more noticeable still, she over-elaborated details to such an extent in some of her songs that the singing became restless and fatiguing. Formerly Mme. Culp sang with a noble simplicity; the other day she too often sang like a self-conscious artist, like one who was too anxious to "make points" and make effect. May she soon return to her earlier and better style! Yet another singer, one whom Time cannot spare much longer, is still, in all essentials, as fine an artist as ever she was. We refer to Mme. Melba. It is true that in the florid music of the first Act of "Roméo et Juliette" she has no longer the ease and beauty of tone which used to charm as well as dazzle us, and the very high notes are not beautiful now. But that cannot be helped, though we may be allowed to wish that the singer herself would recognise the fact. But in the suave and extremely vocal phrases of the second and third Acts the quality of tone is still miraculous, and the singing is as finished and perfect as ever it was. Whatever "superior" people may say about this opera, we will maintain that it was always worth while going to hear it, if only to hear Mme. Melba chant the tender melody of her first address to Roméo in the second Act. Even Patti herself did not sing this passage more beautifully.

Covent Garden has surely acquired two very valuable recruits in MM. Franz and Gilly. In the part of Roméo M. Franz frequently over-sang himself and got out of tune, and was too loud in the duets for Mme. Melba; but his voice is fine, warm, rich, and he has sincerity and fervour. Since the days of M. de Reszke we do not think there has been a better Roméo, and in "O jour de deuil" he was so good as to remind us strongly of his great predecessor. M. Gilly was an admirable Mercutio. It may be that the colour of his voice is too uniform, but it is a noble voice, and M. Gilly has plenty of variety, and a skill in treating his phrases lightly and effectively, which augur well for his future success. The history of the career of Gounod's "Roméo" in England is not without its warning to impetuous critics. Long ago it was found to have no melody, even as "Faust" before it. Had not Madame Patti insisted on singing it once a year its very existence would have been forgotten. Then the De Reszkes took it up, aided by Melba, and it became the most popular opera of its time, adored by the very people who now find it so thin and faded—"So very inferior to Puccini!"

A pianist who certainly must not be included in the list of artists who imperil their greatness by exaggeration or carelessness is M. Rosenthal. Though he has been playing a good many years he shows no tendency to rely upon his already acquired reputation. On the contrary, he plays better and better. One is inclined to hazard the guess that his own enjoyment in his perfectly-phrased Beethoven and his splendidly happy Schumann is greater than in his amazing feats of virtuosity in Liszt and Chopin. But he would not be human if he did not also enjoy the power he has of keeping a just balance between his passages of seeming frenzy and those where his tranquil touch is so mellifluous. It were vain to try and describe how he went from strength to strength in his attack on the impossibilities of Liszt's "Masaniello" Fantasia. He was as accurate as he was audacious, and it was wonderful to hear.

SOME OLD THEATRES OF PARIS

THE PALAIS-ROYAL—II.

By Marc Logé

With time the puppet-show lost its novelty, and Delomel, who appears to have possessed an initiative character, slipped one evening a real child on the stage, in the midst of the marionettes—a real child contented to gesticulate as did its wooden partners. This innovation having provoked a renewed interest in the Beaujolais, he engaged several other children, so that gradually the "fantoccini" were excluded and replaced by small girls and boys. At first these performers only mimicked their rôles, but little by little they began to speak, and to answer the actors in the wings. The Beaujolais made a full house each night, as all Paris was talking of these astonishing children. Nevertheless the police soon intervened, for among the Beaujolais' most ardent enemies were to be numbered the Opéra, the Comédie Italienne, and the austere Comédie Française, whose house was deserted in favour of the Beaujolais, situated only a few hundred yards away. These three influential theatres obtained at last a judgment stipulating that the Beaujolais should be closed, much to the despair of its management and of its habitual audience. One of the directors took upon himself to go and see Mme. Necker, wife of the great minister, who was also a distant relation of his. Thanks to her gracious intercession he obtained permission for the Beaujolais to have, "besides the non-breathing figures which appeared on the scene, pantomimes, and even comedies, played by young children, on condition that other actors, hidden, should speak and sing in their stead, and they might even have a ballet in which the same children could appear. . . ." If these stipulations seem at present rather incomprehensible, we should remember that, at that epoch, "the Opéra alone granted the authorisation of singing, and the Comédie Française that of speaking in public theatres" in France. A few years later the Revolution was to sweep away all these ancient prejudices!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Beaujolais reopened its doors, being in perfect order with all possible regulations; and the Opéra was condescending enough to allow the directors "to have airs sung on well-known vaudevilles, or even on new music which composers might bring them." It is curious to note that, in order to have people sing in the plays represented on the stage, the Beaujolais paid an annuity of "133 livres, 6 sols, and 8 deniers" to the Royal Academy of Music!

Thus the Beaujolais, nicknamed "Les Mimes du Palais-Royal," was officially recognised as a regular theatre, and, far from being astonished at seeing children mimicking on the stage whilst other people spoke for them in the wings, the audience seems to have considered this a remarkable improvement on the puppets! The small actors were so conscientious that they even carried their mimicking to the extent of opening their mouths at the right moment without emitting any sound; and theatrical records of the time state that they thus gave a very complete illusion of reality.

As was to be expected, bitter rivalries sprang up between the young actors and actresses, whose ages varied from nine to twelve years old. One, who was evidently of a violent temperament, went so far as to try to strangle a comrade to whom the management had given a good part. Happily these children were under the supervision of an "instituteur," to whom was intrusted the task of teaching them how to gesticulate, &c. This "instituteur" was beloved by his young pupils, for he was kind, though severe, and very just. And by his encouraging voice and affectionate words he often soothed the enmities raging in the hearts of those small people.

The little actors were comparatively well paid, for we see in M. Louis Pericaud's interesting work on the Théâtre Beaujolais that their salaries varied, according to their ages, from 500f. to 2,500f. a year. And we read with amusement in the same book this kind and thoughtful notice quoted from a directorial "avis" of 1788:—"Le spectacle des Beaujolais commence à cinq heures et demi pour permettre aux spectateurs d'aller prendre le frais du soir vers dix heures, sous les frais ombrages du Jardin du Palais-Royal."

The Théâtre Beaujolais enjoyed great popularity until 1788, when unfortunately a scandal occurred. Several of the little actresses were now budding into young girls, whose youth and pretty faces drew to the "foyer" of the Beaujolais a swarm of rakes and men about town. Some of the children paid far too much attention to the flattering words of these beaux, with the result that certain facts were soon reported to the police. The authorities interfered, and the children were replaced by regular comedians, whilst a small show, "Le Musée des Enfants," took in the little actors, who were thus compelled to leave the Beaujolais.

Deprived of its troop of children, which constituted its chief attraction, the poor Théâtre Beaujolais saw its receipts diminish considerably. Things went from bad to worse, for in 1789 Louis XVI., having let himself be overruled by the influence of his Court, dismissed Necker, who was extremely popular. The people were infuriated by this measure, and when the other ministers sent in their resignations popular wrath knew no limit. A terrible riot broke out; Camille Desmoulins harangued the crowd in the Palais-Royal Garden, and two days later the Bastille was captured by the indignant citizens. The Théâtre Beaujolais was obliged to close for the time being, and one of its directors retired. The house was on the verge of bankruptcy, when Delomel managed to find sufficient funds to enable him to continue for a short time. The 20th of August, 1789, the Beaujolais was the scene of a tumult. An author, desirous no doubt of writing a "pièce d'actualité," composed a vaudeville entitled "La Politique à la Halle," in which were keenly caricatured some of the most prominent leaders of the Halles, or Central Markets, of Paris, which were destined to be the hotbed of the French Revolution. On hearing this, the "Dames et Forts de la Halle" conceived a great indignation, and went in a band to the Beaujolais to protest. There was a riot; several people were arrested, and the next day the Beaujolais was closed by order of the authorities.

THROUGH FRANCE IN A MOTOR

By Frank Harris

There are two main routes for any one who wishes to go from Nice to Paris across the Alps: the one through Grasse and Castellane, the other along the Var by Puget-Théniers and St. André to Digne. The first way I took in 1898 with a friend, who brought over from Cannes the first motor-car in which I had ever driven, a George-Richard 5 or 7 h.p., I forget which, belt driven. I was delighted with the new plaything, and at once engaged the proprietor-chauffeur to take us across the Alps and by way of Grenoble and Geneva to Paris.

What a time we had on the road: we had to get out and push the car on every steep hill; we were always losing belts at night and having to search for them along the road in the dark. We took four days to get to Grenoble, and yet the experiences were all interesting, and now, in retrospect, delightful.

This trip was different; the car was a 35h.p. Mercèdès landaulet. We left Nice at five in the afternoon of the 2nd of June, and ordered dinner at Digne at nine. Though the distance is only a hundred miles, the road is narrow and winding, and rises in places over 3,000ft. We ran out of Nice in perfect summer weather, and turned up the valley of the Var. The little stream is not famed for beauty; no one compares it with the Rhine, or Thames, or Hudson, but from Levens, say, perched on its crag 1,000ft. above the road on the right to St. André, some thirty miles away, it shows a variety of exquisite scenes that can compare with any in the world.

Near Villars the broad bed of the Var narrows to a stream; the valley becomes a defile or gorge, and the scenery grows continually wilder. Again and again the mountain walls, 1,000ft. in height, draw together in front of us, and make it difficult to believe that one can pass. On the left waterfall after waterfall tumbles down between the cliffs, while on the right the crags and shoulders of the great peaks and hummocks take on a hundred colours: now they are pine-clad and sombre green, now laughing gay with golden rain of broom. Several of the scenes are sublime in wild beauty. Puget-Théniers, though a pleasant little place, has little of the charm of Entrevaux, which is a seventeenth-century stronghold throned on the Var itself. The only approach is by a bridge, half of which is bridge, and the further half drawbridge. The walls of the houses fall sheer into the river, while here and there one sees a sentinel-tower, or echaugette, stuck against the wall 40ft. above the torrent in the quaintest way possible. On a rock perched 600ft. higher than the town stands the citadel as on a needle—a formidable nest of robbers in the later Middle Ages commanding both highway and river.

Steadily the road rises and the valley narrows; we pass tunnel after tunnel cut out of the rock; here and there the red layers of stone are flecked with green patches of lichen—"the unimaginable touch of Time" that Wordsworth speaks of.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Some little way past Annot came the outstanding experience of this first day. It began to sleet and then to snow; we realised that we had ascended over 2,500ft. since leaving Nice. We were ringed about with high mountains, all snow-clad even in June. Approaching the Col de Saint Michel the road every now and then became a torrent; indeed in parts there was no road, only a mountain stream foaming across the way in a deep gully. We passed two motors broken down, but our trusty Mercédès went on as if the road were perfect, and in a little while, in spite of the warning of some soldiers that the road had been altogether swept away, we ran down the hill into St. André safe and sound in the gathering dusk. After lighting up, we reached Digne a little after nine, and at the Hôtel Boyer-Mistre found an excellent dinner and comfortable beds at a most reasonable price.

On starting we agreed that the scenery on the first day had been so wonderful that we could not expect a new sensation for some time. But the second day provided unexpected pleasures. On leaving Digne at 10 o'clock in the morning one realised how delightfully it was placed with mountains of 6,000ft. or 8,000ft. in height guarding it on two sides. For some distance we ran beside the river Bleone; within an hour we came to the little hamlet of Malijai, where we discovered an old door with the date above it in stone—1682. A little further on we reached the village of Château Arnoux, with a château of the Renaissance in fair preservation the door was good, the staircase and many of the rooms fine, the windows mullioned in Renaissance crosses.

The road grew more and more picturesque. We swept across a new suspension bridge, at the junction of the Durance and the Buech, and were soon in Sisteron. The far side of the town is crowned by a citadel on a crag some 300ft. or 400ft. above the streets. We ran out under a battlemented gate and stopped ravished. Below us on the right ran the Buech, a mountain torrent, the other side of the river was dominated by an immense triangular rock, the precipitous face of which was all striated as with huge coils of rope, the Mont de la Baume, 1,149 metres in height, or quite 1,600ft. above us. The citadel on one hand, the great pyramid of cliff on the other, and between them the battlemented gate and the foaming torrent—nothing more picturesque could be seen.

From Sisteron we had a choice of roads to Grenoble, and we chose the more direct, and had no reason to regret it, for the scenery grew wilder and more beautiful continually as the road ran steadily upwards.

Suddenly I became aware that the road was descending rapidly, and a moment later I recognised it as the place where fourteen years before in our little George-Richard car we had killed a ram which had charged the auto. My first impression of the delights of automobile driving was gained on this descent. As the little car, free of the engine, swam down the road the mountain peaks on our left seemed to rise higher and higher momently, giving an impression of peculiar grandeur and aloofness as if the mountains were withdrawing themselves majestically from our too curious scrutiny. Nothing more delightful than this mountain pass, which I take to be the Col du Fau, have I seen from that day to this.

The great mountains on either hand are pine-clad almost to the summits. But amongst the usual pines are darker pines, looking for all the world like black soldiers, here parked in battalions, here running off into a point as if the blacks were climbing to the assault. Amid the pines are jewelled clearings where the grass shines in tender spring-green like eau de nil. On our right a gorge hundreds of feet below us, and as we swing round the first curve we look out over fifty or sixty miles of country outspread as in an ordnance map. Here and there, half hidden in the folds of the valleys, little red-roofed villages. We look back again at the pine-clad mountains we are leaving, and are surprised by another wonder. Behind the piney heights there is a higher range of mountains, all ermine clad even on this summer evening. As we turn again swinging down the road, we come in full view of Mont Aiguille. Mont Aiguille, over 6,000ft. in height, looks for all the world like a shape of blancmange cut in porphyry. For centuries it was called one of the wonders of the Dauphiny, and was regarded as inaccessible. There is an almost flat prairie on top of 1,000 metres in length. It was scaled first in 1492 by Antoine de Ville, a courtier of Charles VIII., with eight comrades, among whom were an eschelleur and a priest. The view is simply entrancing and it changes every moment. Below us outspread a great undulating plain, with its little towns and hamlets dotted about, all ringed in with encircling snow-clad mountains. On the left the great Mont Aiguille. Forty miles off in front bastion on bastion.

Half an hour's run brought us to the little town of Monestier-de-Clermont, which we found was 2,500 feet above the sea-level, so the valley we looked out over is really a mountain plateau. Monestier-de-Clermont is a favourite resort for winter sports, and even now the air is sharp and invigorating. The little town was crowded with farmers; a fair was going on. The hotel, the Lion d'Or, was over-run, but we fared better than in far more pretentious hostelries. The landlady waited; the landlord, a strong young fellow of about thirty, who was cook as well, prepared us an excellent steak with soufflé potatoes. The wine was fair, but afterwards there was an eau de vie de Marc—the favourite liqueur of General de Gallifet—which was excellent. The landlord said he had made it himself and kept it in cask more than seven years. After lunch we swept on over the gorgeous plateau to Grenoble; both of us agreeing that the scenery of the second day was even finer than the valley of the Var.

The next morning we got up early to visit the museum, but found it shut. Suddenly we realised that it was Whit Sunday. We knocked at the door, and an old woman opened it, to whom we explained our position: "Could we not come in?" "Certainly," she said. "My husband always leaves me in charge on the chance that someone may really want to come in." How French, how charming, how different from the rigorous English formalism, which would have kept the doors barred and bolted! After thanking her we went in and spent two gaudy hours.

First of all I found a contemporary portrait of Admiral Coligny, which gave me the real man. The great victim of the St. Bartholomew had always interested me, and here he was at length as he walked and talked. A pointed face with an aquiline, outjutting Roman nose, a little moustache and chin beard, almost heart-shaped and quite grey; the goatee beard a little whiter than the moustache, the texture of the hair very soft, like moss—grey moss. The eyes dark brown, with sidelong glance—suspicious; the mouth firm, though the lips are sensitive and well cut; the forehead rather broad than high—the cautious, ruminating face of a gentleman born into difficult conditions, but not a great face, anything but a great face.

Next I was struck by a picture of Fantin-Latour, "The Temptation of St. Antony," a lovely woman's form floating in a blue mist in the foreground; the Saint has turned his back to her and is examining, or pretending to examine, a Death's head. What a poor fool! one could not help thinking. Life and love and joy offered to him, and he prefers to look at Death and commune with Death's loathly symbol. Love and the woman were the better choice.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Two pictures by Phillippe de Champaigne, to whom we owe the great portrait of Richelieu; a large one of Louis XIV. and his courtiers, a very dignified scene and pleasing to the eye. The second a portrait of the painter himself—a proud face with an artist's lips, and a certain love of the beautiful shown in the long, waving hair and the silky, soft down of moustache and beard.

But what took my eye especially were certain primitives, and notably a triptych of the Florentine school painted about 1430 in a serrated, wooden Gothic frame of the period. These early masters were not perhaps able to paint as well as the later ones, but their vision of life was more sincere, and their personages living, recognisable men and women.

From the gallery of paintings we passed through to the gallery of sculpture, a gallery filled with masterpieces of primitive artists of a dozen different races. Here was a bust of a lady found in Palmyra, and lo! she has straight, Grecian features, and wears necklets with brooches attached, and armlets painted to represent gold. Human nature has not altered much in twenty centuries. Here, too, are mediæval saints from Savoy in wood and marble, stone and pottery, of a hundred different styles, and round the walls Gothic chests of exquisite workmanship, and Renaissance cassonis where the wood has flowered into shapes of beauty.

The most popular work of art in the collection, according to the guardian, is a large picture, "The Arrest of Charlotte Corday," by H. Scheffer; but both painting and drawing are second-rate, and the heroine's face is utterly uninspired. This girl's story is one of the great stories of all time, and some day or other a master will make a world-epic of it.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By Lancelot Lawton

A SUGGESTION: THE KING AND QUEEN TO VISIT PARIS

The Coronation, which has brought to London a brilliant assemblage composed of distinguished representatives of all the Thrones and nations in the world and of all our overseas Dominions and possessions, is in any case destined to make the year memorable in the history of the British Empire. But in consequence of the splendid initiative and faultless tact of our gracious Sovereign—those supreme qualities of true kingship inherited from an illustrious father—it is no exaggeration to add that not only will the year be memorable for this imposing display of Royal pomp and circumstance in the capital itself, but it will be characterised by a remarkable series of events calculated to shame and stem the petty strife of warring factions, and to excite spontaneous outbursts of loyal devotion such as we hope will ring and re-echo in all quarters of the Empire the clear note of British strength and British solidarity. In short, 1911 will be a Royal year, and, above all, essentially an Imperial one.

The monarch who, when heir to the Throne, gave to the nation that invigorating watchword, "Wake up, England!" has himself not been slow to set a practical example. After being crowned in the capital he is to visit his people in Wales, in Ireland, and in Scotland. That, in order to meet the wishes of his subjects, he has in his wisdom not hesitated to create precedents is manifest from his decision to undertake a magnificent mission to distant India, no less than from his sanction to the Investiture of the Prince of Wales in the ancient Principality itself. His early association with the Navy, and the spirit of thoroughness in which, when Heir-Apparent, he embarked on extensive journeyings to the outposts of Empire, spread wide the conviction that, like his immortal predecessor, he would make a virile monarch and, above all, a monarch with an adequate recognition of Imperial responsibilities and a thorough knowledge of Imperial needs. It is not presumption to say that in those days the lofty conception of duty in Royal father and Royal son was ideal in its adaptation to the complex requirements of the British Empire. Among the kings of the world our late Sovereign was known as the kingly Ambassador of peace; and of King George, before he ascended the Throne, it can be truthfully said that his rôle was that of the princely missioner of Imperialism.

Many and onerous are the demands made upon Royal attention, and perhaps it is not sufficiently realised that the youthful age of the Heir-Apparent does not permit of any delegation of activity on the part of the King; while the appointment of his Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught to the Governor-Generalship of Canada will deprive his Majesty of some very valuable assistance at present at his disposal. In these circumstances, and, moreover, when we consider that the claims upon the time of the monarch have increased with the expansion of the Empire, it is clear that the burden of work that centres round the Throne is as enormous as it is varied. Yet thus early has King George shown that he is determined to maintain the influence of the British monarchy as a living factor in the world's diplomacy and as a bulwark of the world's peace. The visit of the German Emperor to this country, though the occasion was of a semi-private nature mainly arising from family associations, had none the less a special and a welcome significance. Then, if rumour be correct, the Tsar is expected shortly to pay a visit to British waters, a circumstance that not inconceivably augurs something more than cousinly amity.

To place the coping-stone upon the grand edifice of this year's Royal accomplishment it only remains for one other engagement to be arranged—a visit of the King and Queen to Paris. In view of the extensive nature of their Majesties' programme we would hesitate to make a suggestion of this kind were we not convinced that its adoption would have an important bearing, and perhaps a very positive and beneficial effect, upon our higher policy. We are inclined to go even farther and to say that some such substantial manifestation of British goodwill towards our friends the French people is imperatively called for at an early date. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the opinion widely prevails, not only in France but also throughout Europe, that Great Britain has become so preoccupied in domestic cavil as to be an almost negligible quantity in the world's diplomacy. Whether or not the circumstances fully warrant this belief is obviously outside the scope of the present discussion; nor is it our intention at the moment to seek to fix responsibility for such a lamentable state of affairs, presuming it to exist, upon any political party or faction in the land. But it is certainly not inopportune to observe here that the pronouncements of a peripatetic Chancellor of the Exchequer, out for a holiday, on a subject of such high consequence as the Entente Cordiale, mingled as they were with spicy interviews accorded to editors of socialistic journals, do not tend to impress the French Government and the French people with our political seriousness in the domain of Foreign Affairs. On the contrary, it can with reason be argued that such palpable indiscretions will only help to accentuate the feeling abroad that, as a result of inhaling too deeply the breezy ozone of our domestic atmosphere, statesmen in power have developed an exuberance dangerously bordering on irrationality.

After all, the farther away the control, or even the influencing, of Foreign Affairs can be removed from the party controversy of home affairs, and, for the matter of that, from the personalities of those engaged in the forefront of such controversy, the better it will be for the real interests of the country. So long as serious courtesy remains the essential spirit, and ceremonial dignity the most fitting outward manifestation, of modern diplomacy, the conduct of the higher policy of States must be left to the select company of Sovereigns and to their Foreign Ministers and Ambassadors. Frequently more beneficial results are achieved from a brief interchange of visits between neighbouring monarchs than from any other means existing in the maintenance of international relations. In this connection it is only necessary to cite the already memorable meeting at Potsdam between the Emperor of Germany and the Emperor of Russia. Our late King was, literally speaking, at home in every capital of Europe, and was beloved not of one but of many peoples. It stands to reason that the present occupant of the Throne has not had the same opportunities of making himself acquainted with European Courts and nations, but it goes without saying that his gifted accomplishments and manly virtues would exercise the same influence in the cause of peace as did those of his late Majesty. Therefore we suggest that as the Entente Cordiale, with its corollary the Triple Entente, is the keystone of our Foreign policy, a start in kingly diplomacy should be made with a visit to Paris. This visit would undeniably produce wholesome results, for not only would it remove the suspicions to which we have already alluded concerning our lukewarm attitude towards our friends, but it would reaffirm with unmistakable emphasis the existence of the Triple Entente as an invigorating factor in the affairs of Europe, thus giving an effectual quietus to the mischief-makers who of late have been busily occupied in persuading themselves of its decease by the very simple process of compiling and publishing on their own account its obituary notice.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE CRISIS IN THE NEAR EAST.

It will be recalled that in describing the conditions in Albania last week I altogether refused to believe the assurances of the Ottoman Government that the crisis was at an end. As a matter of fact heavy fighting has since taken place on the frontier, and the Turkish forces are being largely augmented in order to deal with the situation in a drastic manner. Both Montenegro and Turkey have again protested to the Powers, the one declaring that the other is responsible for the continuance of anarchy and disorder. Germany has frankly declared herself to be the friend of Turkey by suggesting that the Powers should insist upon Montenegro observing a more correct attitude in the future. But the difficulty of arriving at a settlement lies in the fact that the insurgents, embittered by their experience of the past, are suspicious of Turkey's promises of reform, which they regard as merely a ruse for the purpose of inducing them to give up their arms. In all the circumstances it is not easy to see how they can be persuaded of Turkey's sincerity in the matter, nor is it possible to devise any solution in the direction of a European guarantee of Turkish good faith. Meanwhile Austria and Italy are tending pacificatory advice at Cettigne, but they can hardly be gratified at the blunt intrusion of Germany in the delightful rôle of Turkey's only friend. It would seem that the Triple Alliance is divided against itself. Surely the moment has arrived for the Triple Entente to establish its prestige in the Balkans. Such an end can only be obtained by our loyally supporting the policy of Russia, and that of Austria and Italy in so far as it is consistent with the aims of Russia.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15 Copthall Avenue, E.C.

EVERY one in the City is, more or less, a loyal person, with a natural tendency to conserve the present conditions of the world. But the loyalty of the City would be severely strained if it were compelled to assist at many Coronations. Business has been at an almost complete standstill for weeks past, and no one expects any revival until King George has been safely crowned. Why such an event should not only prevent investors from investing their money, but also utterly stop speculators from gambling, is a question not even the most acute psychologist could answer. We deal with facts in the City, and the fact that the crowning of a King acts as an antidote to the gambling fever is a proved certainty.

We are all much annoyed at the way we have been treated over the Chinese Loan. It was an international affair. It was backed by four nations. It was cheap and it was safe. Therefore everybody agreed that it would go to a premium—which it did. And most of us sent in our applications. But the faint-hearted got absolutely nothing, and no one who applied for £1,000 got more than £100, whilst those who asked for £5,000 only got £200, and so on in proportion. This is the way the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank people play the game. It is really much less trouble, and almost as cheap, to buy stock in the open market at a small premium than to be put to the trouble of sending in a cheque for a big amount only to be disappointed.

The Platinum and Gold Company that proposes to dredge in Columbia does not appear to have met with a warm reception, and I am not surprised, for the prospectus calmly disregards the ordinary rules of the City, and gives us no proper report, only vague stories by local people. The Dangar Rubber Company has two good men on the Board in the shape of Harrison and Henly. They are as experienced rubber-planters as we can get. The land is cheap, but who wants rubber companies to-day? They are out of fashion. Those who must invest in rubber can buy into proved concerns round about par. Still, any one who takes shares and is prepared to wait three or four years will probably get his 10 per cent. dividend.

We are promised an Aviation Company with a moderate Board. The venture proposes to buy some land at Lingfield and erect sheds. It will teach people to fly with aeroplanes and generally annoy Mr. Winston Churchill, who hates flying men more than he fears militant suffragettes. The future of such a concern is more than doubtful, and I am afraid it will succeed even less than did the Grahame White Blériot Company.

MONEY does not worry us these dull days. The Lombard Street bill brokers are glad enough to take good bills at even $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But whether this low price will last seems doubtful. The Bank position does not seem to have been much affected by the Birkbeck stoppage, but I write this before the figures for the current week are issued. The purchase of the goodwill and premises by the London County and Westminster shows enterprise, but more pluck would have saved the bank. All the great Joint Stock Banks knew that the Birkbeck must close, and I am astounded that none of them purchased before the closing of the doors. They would have secured many millions of deposits. That they did not do it would seem to show that the depreciation in securities was much greater than appears on the surface.

FOREIGNERS are stupidly idle, and, although there are still a few stale bulls of Perus who wish to unload, the rest of the market has nothing to do except watch the very rich gamblers buy Rio Tinto. The Paris people are short, and as the Yankees will put up copper if they can Tintos seem safe for a further rise. Russians are steady, but no one in England buys this fine investment.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

HOME RAILS are now so full of dividend that they look cheaper than ever. The traffics continue to be good, and Lancashire and Yorkshire are still one of the cheapest stocks in the Railway market. Great Northerns are also underpriced. They quickly rose when it was found that all the dealers were short. But we must not imagine that because the dealers are short of stock that there are no bulls about. Almost all the buyers of the heavy lines pawn their stock with Banks, and thus a hidden bull account exists side by side with an apparent bear account. I do not think that any of the Banks will shake out their clients this side of the half-year. They did their shake out a week or two back, and those who are now in are the solid folks whose accounts are worth keeping, and whose credit is good. I think that no one can go wrong in buying the really sound stocks, such as London and North Western, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and Great Easterns. But I do not like the perpetual puffs of Great Central. I am afraid that a big bull account has been built up here, in which case we may see considerable realisation when the accounts are published. Nevertheless the 1894 preference look fairly cheap.

YANKEES are a see-saw market. The bucket shops puff Eries and Steels, and as a result we see a most unsteady market in both securities. I do not believe the stories about the purchase of Erie. The line is doing fairly well, but I do not think Morgans will let it go. The tale has probably been put about with the idea of unloading. Rocks are talked much higher, and this by sober-minded people, who do not like small Yankees as a rule. I have no news from the other side worth telling. What I have is rather bearish. The trade in the West is not good, and though Wall-street talks big the large bankers advise caution. It seems to me that Yankee rails are best left alone.

RUBBER is sick, but the jobbers are buying back their shares, and this has given the whole market tone. The public declines to come in. It lost heavily in rubber, for it got in at the top and has never been able to get out. I see no reason why any one should buy to-day, for unless the Americans can absorb the huge stocks in Para and Manaos raw rubber is not likely to rise. 2s. 6d. a pound profit is the outside figure that can be made by the best plantation to-day, and next year this profit may fall to 1s. The outputs will not increase, for more of the companies have over-tapped their young trees, and will pay the penalty in reduced production for the next few years. The rubber boom is definitely over, and the companies must now stand the racket of severe industrial competition in a falling market.

OIL.—The Mexican Eagle is doing well and the shares are being bought. Spies has declared a good dividend, but the price has reached a figure that does not tempt me. They say that the oil war is over in the East, and Shells and Burmahs may rise. But Maikop seems under a cloud.

KAFFIRS are not fashionable. No one wants to gamble in Mines, and we must wait until the dealers are even more short than they are to-day. The dividends are now mostly declared, and on the whole are good. But they will be better next time, for an effort is to be made to cut down expenses and increase outputs.

RHODESIANS are on the up-grade, and Rhodesia Exploration, the leading share in the market, is not expensive even to-day. The combine is now solidly built up, and if no one "rats" we may expect a steady market. But I see no hope of any boom.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

BERNARD SHAW AT CAMBRIDGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It seems to me that Mr. Austin H. Johnson's resentment is of a somewhat narrow form, otherwise his advocacy of Mr. Shaw's teaching would not have been based upon the weaknesses of other opposing forces.

Does he really desire us to accept Shavian tenets upon the understanding that the "Christian religion" can be so modified to fit them? Or does his (Mr. Johnson's) desire assume even meaner proportions—proportions limited, like the desire of Bernard Shaw himself, to the glorification of self-idolatry—Johnsonianism with a helpful flavour of Shavian notoriety? The peculiar nature of Mr. Johnson's sensitiveness to criticism leads one to think so.

Who is this Bernard Shaw—this Socialistic idealist—that his morality or public preaching should not be subject to question? There is a vast gulf between Bernard Shaw, dramatist and entertainer, and Bernard Shaw, public instructor. Mr. Shaw is free to amuse us to his heart's content, but when his aim is to destroy or "undermine conviction, and to sap the centuries-old foundation of civilised communion," as the Editor of THE ACADEMY rightly and justly surmises, then it was about time such an aim experienced some sort of a check.

Again, one requires patience and pity to read Mr. Johnson's letter. It is so superficial in its blatant anger. I will pick out, for example, one conspicuous crudity. Mr. Johnson includes Christ in his category of "great religious teachers whose whole object has always been 'to undermine conviction,' &c." Man never made a grosser misstatement.

Let me inform Mr. Johnson that Christ's whole object was the destruction of Pharisaism and not Judaism—the false worship of God, not the true worship. Hence Mr. Johnson will no doubt see the truth contained in the words, "Ubi spiritus ibi ecclesia."—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

P.S.—Christianity is pure Judaism, else it has no meaning. It cannot be modified to fit modern kinds, any more than it was found to fit with Judaic kinds, of Pharisaism.

"CONTEMPORARY BELGIAN POETRY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not wish to occupy your space unduly. There are two letter-writers in your issue of the 17th, however, who should be answered:—

(a) If Mr. Savage will send on the poems which are "not his own," but "as good of their kind as anything since Keats," I will consider them from a publisher's point of view; but I must warn him that I am not the proprietor here—only a servant—who am not galloping to be fined, imprisoned, or robbed by bad investments of the working capital entrusted to me.

(b) As to "R. M."—his assumption that Professor Bithell needs sympathy for "the treatment he has received at my hands" may make the Professor smile. Why "R. M." should drag in the word "insincere" in respect to myself I cannot divine. I am a publisher, and publishers, unfortunately, are not poets, but men called upon hourly to face unpleasant commercial aspects, among which are "mutilations"—to gratify famous Mrs. Grundy. It is unfortunate that, according to "R. M.," I do not "possess a sincere feeling for art," for some best masters in theoretical, vocal, and instrumental art have been endeavouring to inoculate me with this quality, and this has cost me many years and many guineas. But I confess "R. M." has placed me in a quandary. I cannot be an artist in business—only when I get home to my pianoforte after business hours. In business I am perforce on all fours with the butcher, undertaker, "bookie," and other tradesmen. Hence my wicked behaviour towards Professor Bithell and "Contemporary Belgian Poetry."—Your obedient servant,

FREDERICK J. CROWEST, Editor and General Manager
(For the Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.).

Felling-on-Tyne.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Battle of Souls. By Hugh Naybard. J. and J. Gray and Co., Edinburgh.

The Sovereign Power. By Mark Lee Luther. Illustrated by Chase Emerson. Macmillan and Co. 6s.

Builders of Ships. By Marie Connor Leighton. With Frontispiece. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.

The Coronation of George King. A Lincolnshire Idyll. By Kate Horn. Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. net.

Love—and the People. By Edith Anne Stewart. Lynwood and Co. 6s.

A Maid of the Malverns: A Romance of the Blackfriars Theatre. By T. H. Porter. Lynwood and Co. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Clouds of Aristophanes. With Introduction, English Prose Translation, Critical Notes and Commentary, including a new Transcript of the Scholia in the Codex Venetus Marcianus 474. By W. J. M. Starkie, Hon. LL.D. Macmillan and Co. 12s. net.

The Indelible Factor of Individual Sentient Life. By Godfrey Burchett. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s. net.

Some Reflections on the Drama—and Shakespeare. By Arthur Bourchier. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s. net.

Civil War. A Play in Four Acts by Ashley Dukes. Stephen Swift. 2s. net.

A Still More Sporting Adventure! Humbly dedicated to the Authoresses of "An Adventure," and Transcribed by the Misses Lavinia and Priscilla Daisyfield. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s. net.

Builders of Nations: New Light on the Duties of Motherhood. By Margaret Burke. Greening and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

The Vision of the King. A Coronation Souvenir by Regina Miriam Bloch. Greening and Co. 6d. net.

The Book of the English Oak. By Charles Hurst. Illustrated. Lynwood and Co. 5s. net.

"Chicot" in America. By Keble Howard. Frontispiece. Hutchinson and Co. 1s. net.

The Coast Scenery of North Devon. By E. A. Newell Arber, M.A. Illustrated. J. M. Dent and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.

Nova Scotia: the Province that has been Passed By. By Beckles Willson. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.

India and Imperial Preference. By V. G. Kale, M.A. "Wednesday Review" Press, Trichinopoly. 4 annas.

The Renaissance of the Nineties. By W. G. Blaikie Murdoch. The De La More Press. 1s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Scots in Canada: A History of the Settlement of the Dominion from the Earliest Days to the Present Time. By John Murray Gibbon. With Illustrations in Colour by C. C. Cuneo and C. M. Sheldon. Kegan Paul and Co. 1s. net.

A History of British Mammals. Part VII. By Gerald E. H. Barrett-Hamilton, F.Z.S. Illustrated by Edward A. Wilson. Gurney and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.

The Hon. Mr. V. Krishnaswami Tyer. A Sketch. "The Wednesday Review" Press, Trichinopoly. 4 annas.

EDUCATIONAL

Report of a Conference on the Teaching of Arithmetic in London Elementary Schools, Dec., 1906—Dec., 1908. P. S. King and Son. 1s.

Europe in Pictures. By H. Clive Barnard, M.A. A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d.

Man ual of English Pronunciation and Grammar for the Use of Dutch Students. By J. H. A. Günther. New and Revised Edition. J. B. Wolters, Groningen. 4s. 6d.

VERSE

The Crucible of Time, and other Poems. By Darrell Figgis. J. M. Dent and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

The Little City. By Wilfred Rowland Childe. B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s. net.

Poems. By Bruce E. Money. Jarrold and Sons. 1s. 6d. net.

Songs by the Way. By Margaret Blaikie. A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

Wishing Wood, and other Verses. By Agnes S. Falconer. A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

PERIODICALS

The Literary Digest; Cambridge University Reporter; The Bookseller; University Correspondent; La Revue; Publishers' Circular; Economic Journal; Mercure de France; United Empire; Journal of the Imperial Arts League Incorporated; Revue Bleue; The Triad; Parisiana Summer Annual; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Atlantic Monthly.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Dürer—All books illustrated by Dürer.
Berlinghieri—Geographia, ca. 1480.
Frezzi—Quadrireggio, Firenze, 1508.
Herbarius } All edns. of the Ortus sanitatis } XVth cent.
All liturgical books of the XVth cent.
Nitzschewitz—Psalterium B.M. Virg., Tzennae (1492).
Platea—Opus restitutionum, 1475.
All books printed for Ant. Vérard of Paris.
Ptolemaeus—Cosmographia } All edns. of ——— Geographia } XVth cent.
Early German Books.
Statuta d'Ascoli, 1496.
Valturius—De re militari, 1472.
Thurocz (Twrocz)—Chronica Hungaror. Brünnae, 1488, and Augsburg, 1488.
Bettini—Il monte santo di Dio. Fiorenza, 1477 and 1491.
Boccaccio—Il Decamerone. Venet., Greg de Gregoriis, 1492.
Dante } All edns. of the Aesopus } XVth cent.
All books of the XVth and XVIth cents. printed on vellum.
Block books. All xylographic books, perfect and imperfect.
Bibles of the XVth cent. in all languages.
Chronicon Hungar., Budapest, 1473.
Illuminated MSS. till the XVIth cent.
Early MSS. with and without pictures.
Illustrated Books of the XVth cent. and the beginning of the XVIth.
Prints of the same period.

Report any of the above to—
JACQUES ROSENTHAL
(Antiquarian Bookseller to H.M. the Emperor and King), 47 Brienner Str. 47, Munich (Bavaria).

THE CHURCH ARMY

Pleads earnestly for

CORONATION GIFTS

in aid of its extensive Work.

LABOUR HOMES throughout the land for reclamation of criminals, tramps, loafers, and social wreckage generally, of both sexes.

FARM COLONY. Homes for Youths. 50 per cent. gain a FRESH START IN LIFE.

EMIGRATION for Men, Families, and Lads.

Aid for respectable UNEMPLOYED by provision of work.

FRESH AIR HOMES for Mothers and Children stifling in slums.

LEAGUE OF FRIENDS OF THE POOR, for personal service, by those having some leisure, to distressed families.

MANY OTHER BRANCHES, including widely extended MISSION WORK. 67 Mission Vans constantly perambulating the country districts on invitation of Clergy. Missions in Prisons, Workhouses, and Slums.

URGENTLY NEEDED:—Funds; Old Clothes for Men, Women, and Children; Orders for Firewood (3s. 6d. per 100 bundles); Needlework and Laundry-work; Waste Paper and Rags for sorting.

Cheques, &c., crossed "Barclays a/c Church Army," payable to Prebendary CARLILL, Hon. Chief Secretary; or Mr. W. F. HAMILTON, K.C., Hon. Treasurer, Headquarters, 55, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W. Telephone: Paddington 3440.

Visitors and Inquiries Welcomed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

EDWARD WHISTLER,

11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,

British Made, from £6 10s.

Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,

By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.

Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Royal Charter dated 1839).

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	Days 8 upwards.	Fortnightly Friday.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
THE AZORES.	£17†.	19.	Every Wednesday Fortnight.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day.	12 upwards.	During July & August.	Southampton, Grimsby & Leith.
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

Illustrated Booklet on application to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

London: 18, Moorgate Street, E.C.; or 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

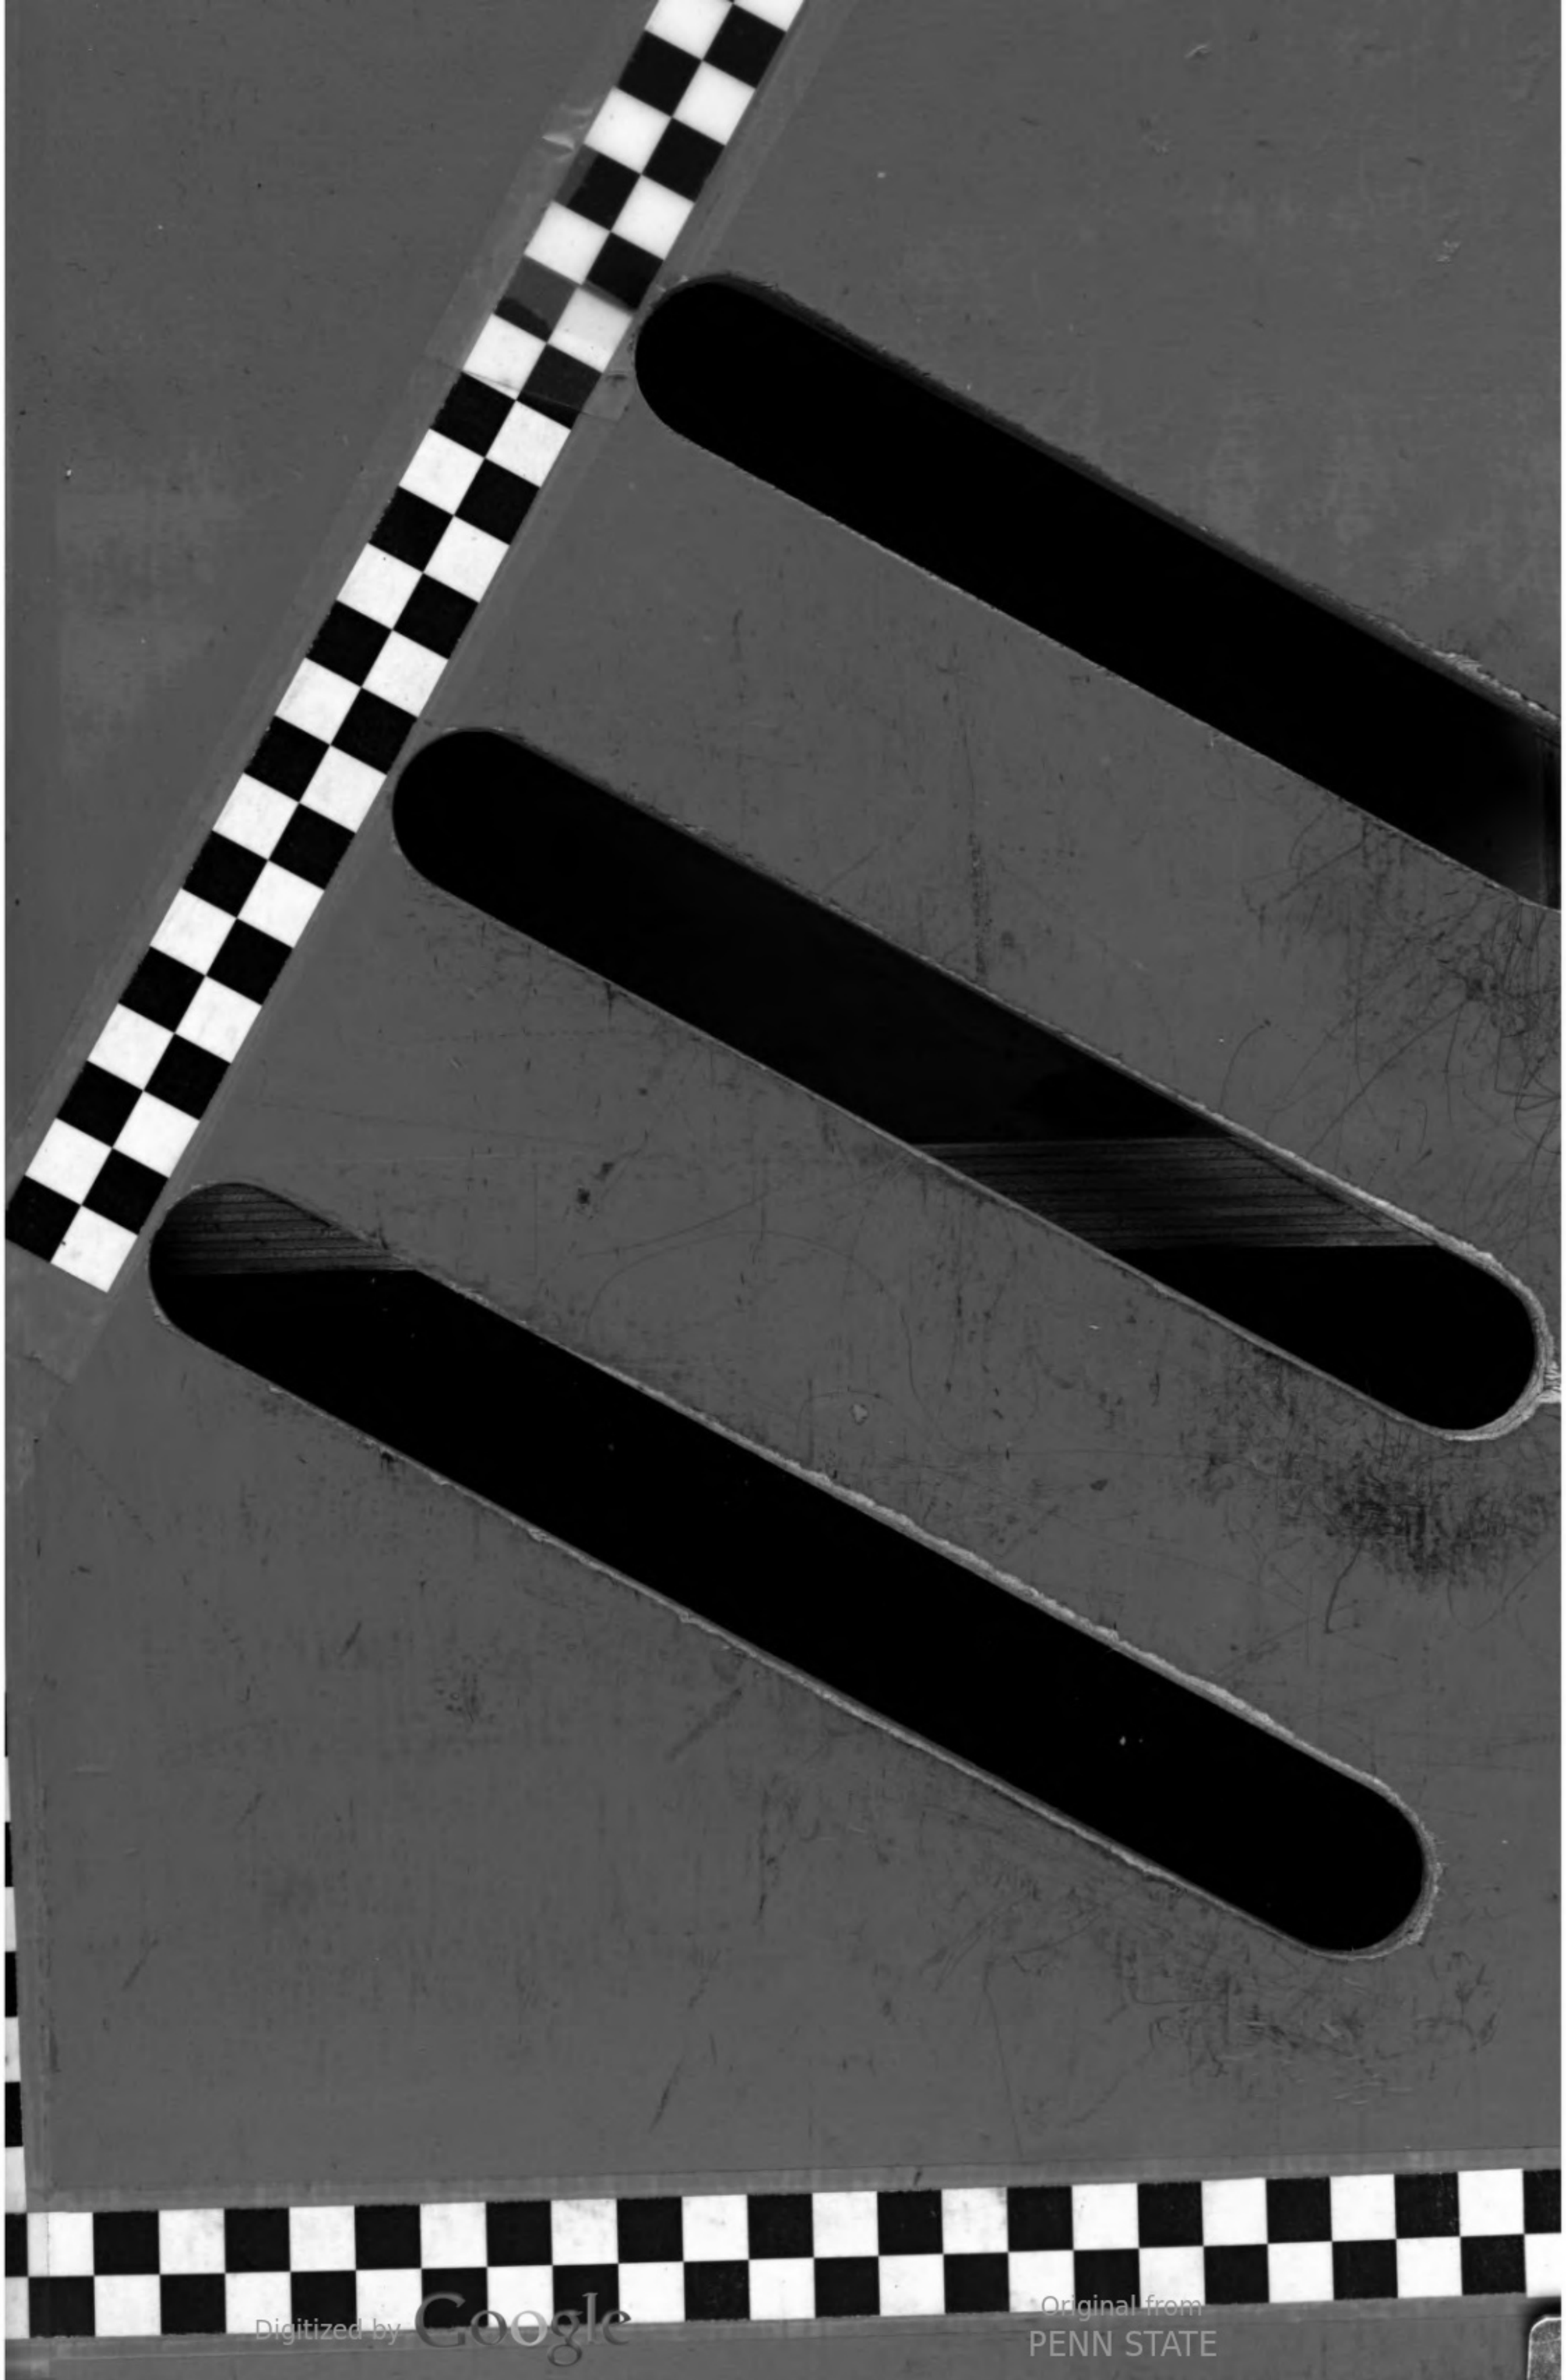
Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

A00002022376 2

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE



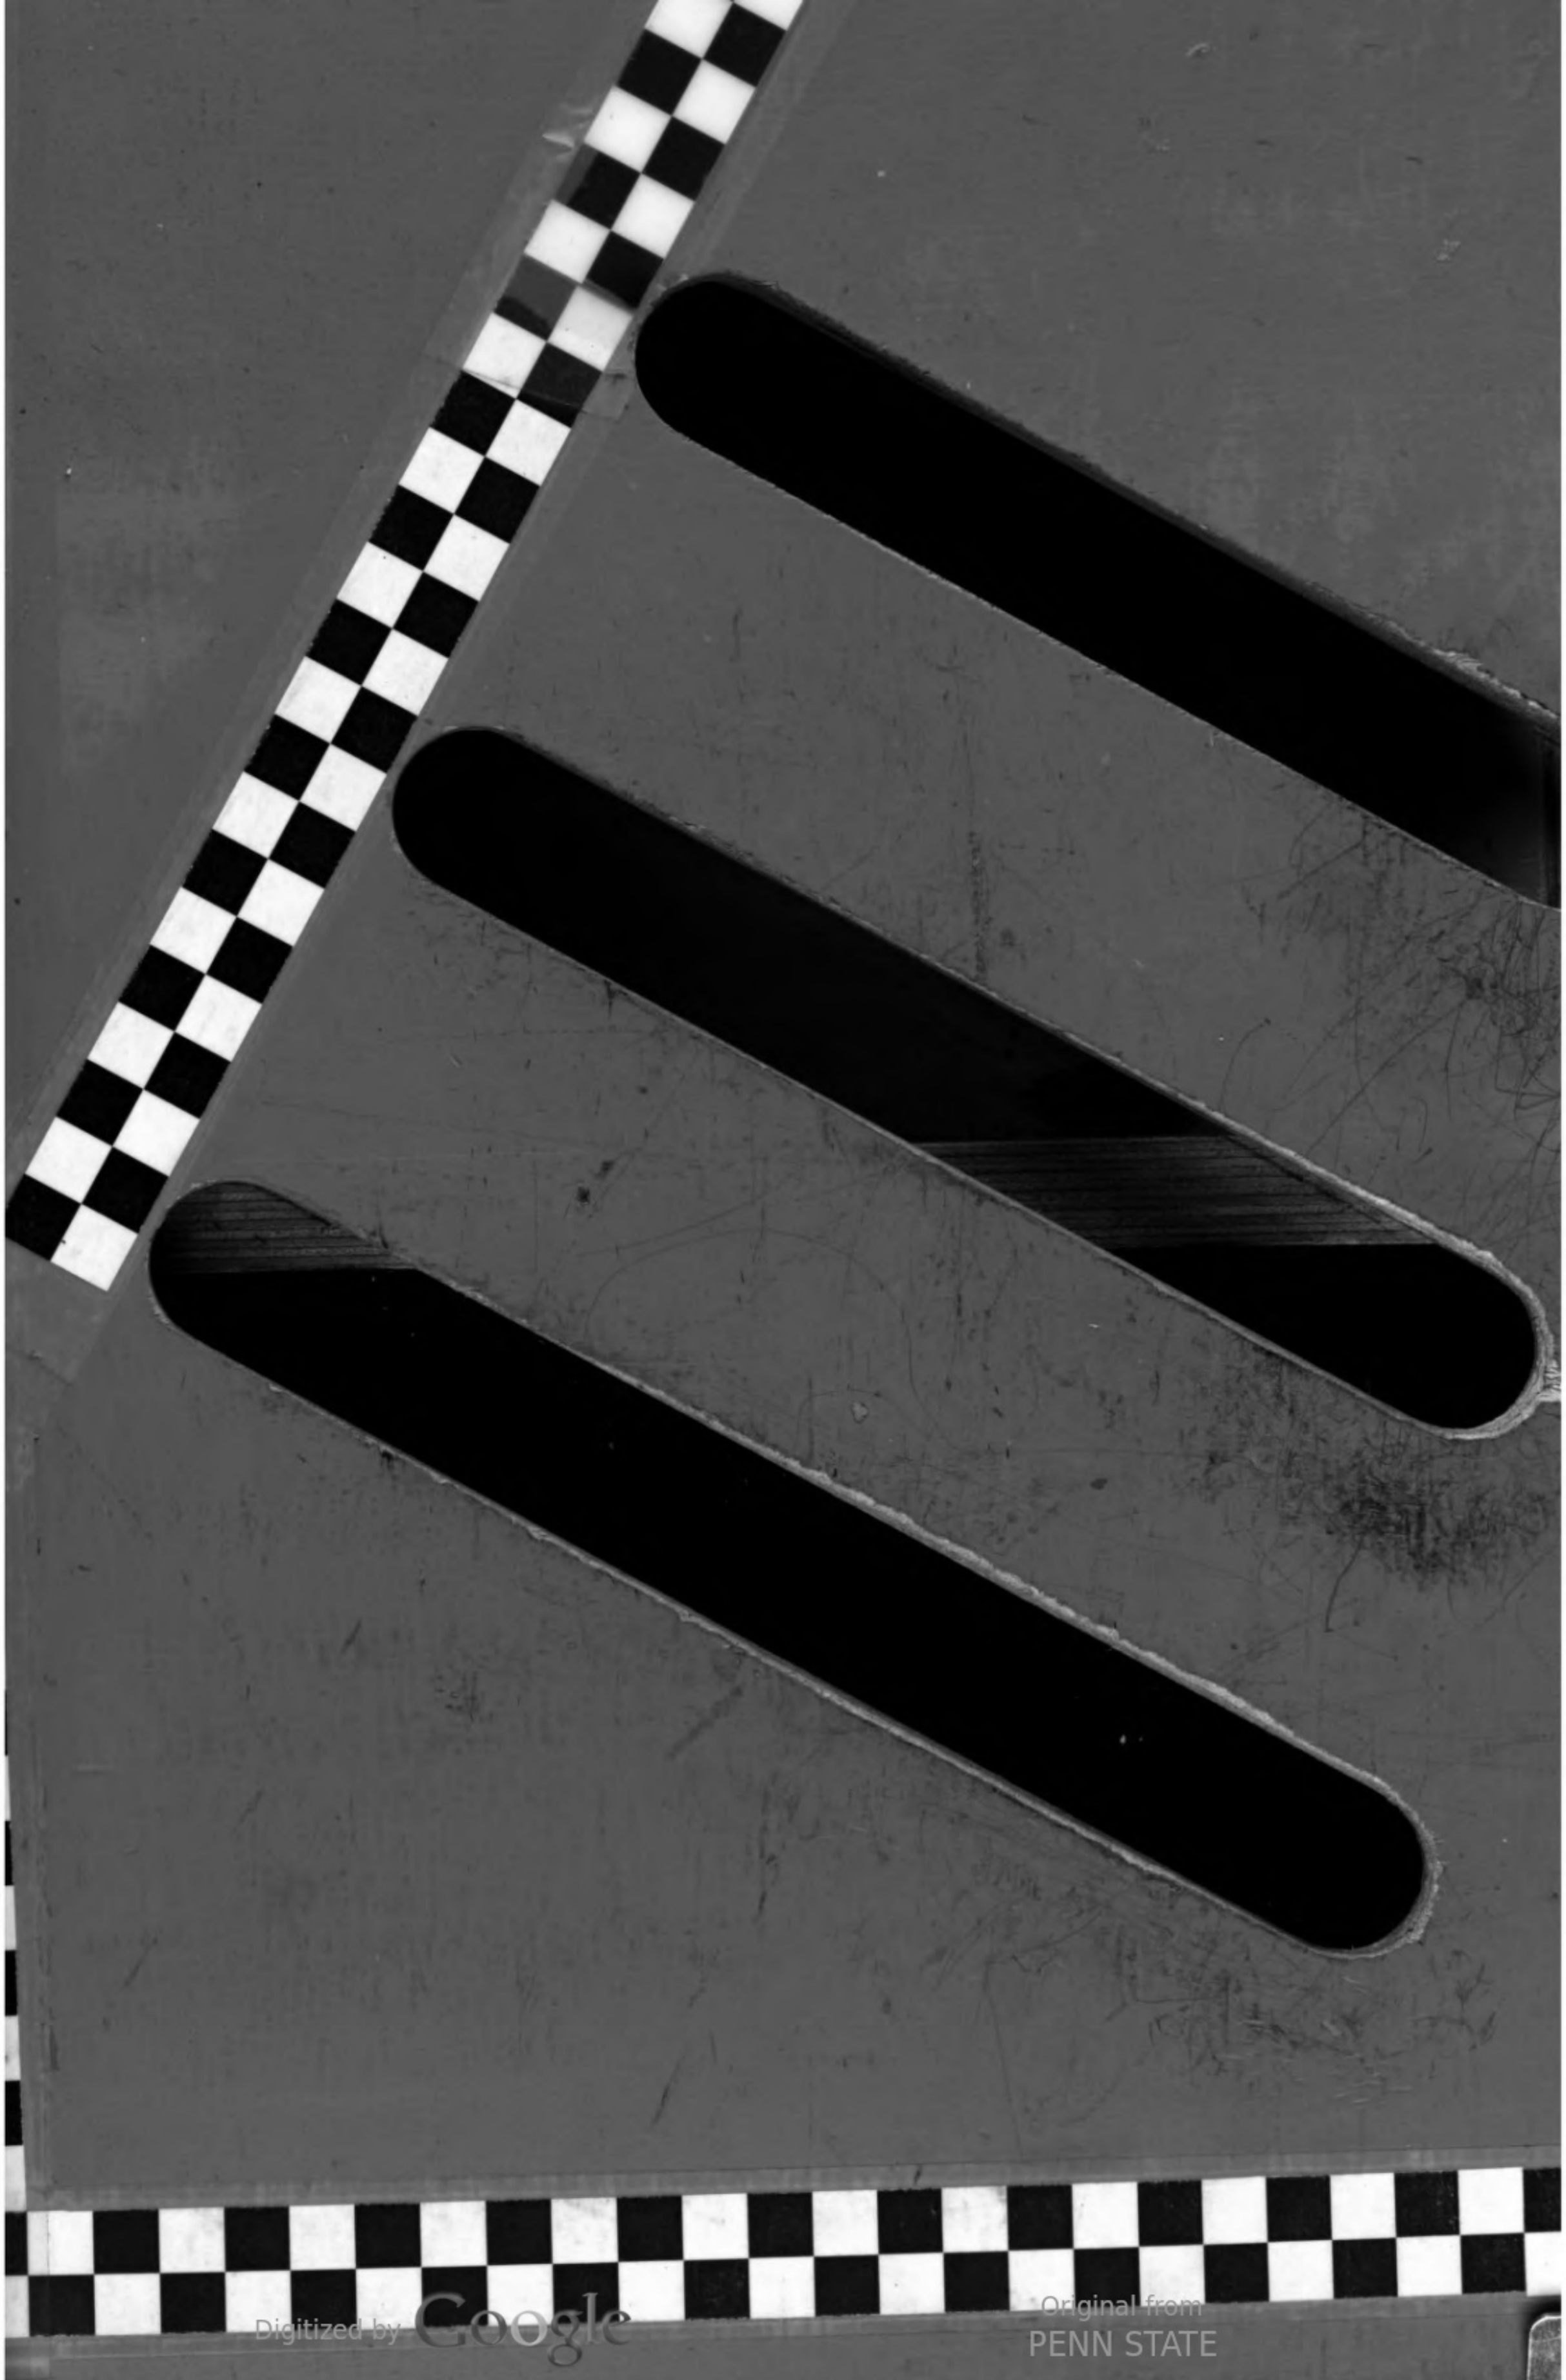
Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

A00002022376 2

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A00002022376 2

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A00002022376 2

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Digitized by Google
Original from
PENN STATE